PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

1. The Gujarát Mitra (86), in its issue of the 28th December, writes :—

Remarks in connection with the visit of His Imperial Highness the Czarewitch to India and the peace and contentment prevailing in India under the British.

The visit of His Imperial Highness the Czarewitch to India will be long remembered as one of the most memorable events in the annals of the British Empire. Its significance cannot be overrated in international politics. Although we have steadfastly been of opinion, ever since the news of the visit was first flashed across to India, that there is no warrant for entertaining any anxiety by the people of India on the score of political complications, we venture to say that when in the course of his tour the Prince comes in contact with the princes and peasants of this country, and personally sees for himself their tendency and indirectly sounds their loyalty, he will carry home with him an impression of a prosperous country and a contented people. With the instinctiveness of a true-born Christian Prince, he will have the hardihood and courage to say to his august father's diplomatic advisers that all along the country he could see nothing but peace and plenty, and an earnest desire on the part of the British administrators to rule on the principles of justice tempered with mercy. Still on our part we believe he could not better return the obligation of his Indian hosts than by conveying to the Russian statesmen a correct idea of the fabulous wealth of Hindustan. He will do well to dispel the erroneous notion lurking in the minds of ill-informed men that it is the land of pagodas where gold mohars and rubbies are freely scattered in Native darbárs. We believe the idea is gaining ground in Russia that the agitation for political reform, which has been progressing for the last few years in this country, and whose latest phases have manifested themselves in the origin and growth of a National Congress, is one of the latent symptoms of popular discontent and a necessary preliminary to a determined effort against British rule. But the Congress, it is needless to say, is a stone in the foundation and consolidation of the British Indian Empire. If the Russian diplomatists are labouring under the false impression that a change of rule is desired by the masses, it is undoubtedly a delusion and a snare; and if any hasty action is taken by the Russians under this mistaken impression, it will doubtless be fraught with the most serious consequences to the Russian Empire at large. But we have sufficient faith in the good sense and intelligence of Russia; and our hopes for more peaceful times will be strengthened by the accurate conception which will be diffused in his country and among his father's political advisers by His Imperial Highness the Czarewitch on his return home. The Czarewitch will see during his residence in India how the Governor of Madras, who has just left the country, consigning the entire administrative portfolio to an honourable member of the Provincial Council without waiting for the arrival of his successor, will be succeeded by Lord Wenlock without dread of a rising or rebellion in Madras during the interval. To appreciate this unparalleled proof of the stability of British rule, His Imperial Highness will have to call back to his mind the lessons, if he has learnt any, in the history of India anterior to the administrations of Clive and Warren Hastings. To the student of Indian history it is scarcely necessary to say how uncertain were even the domineering Moghuls of the stability of their empire at the succession even of the most rightful heirs to the Imperial throne at Delhi. Those were the days of plots behind the magnificent throne, plots beyond the precincts of the palace, and plots even behind the Zenana doors and royal sick-beds. But fortunately now, under the rule of one on whose dominions the sun never sets, they are things of the past. The smoothness and calmness which characterise the exit of an old and the advent of a new Viceroy or Governor, Commissioner or Collector, are so striking that if Aurangzebe or Shiváji were to rise from the dead, the existing sight would perhaps dazzle his eyes or shake his belief. Such is the marvellous contrast in only one of the thousand and one features of pax Britannica which will convey to the Czarewitch many a useful lesson on the India of the Queen-Empress on whose empire the sun never sets, and in whose dominions—

" Freedom broadens slowly down
From precedent to precedent."

2. The Gujaráti (85), in its issue of the 28th December, writes:—There are some among us who will attribute the visit of His Imperial Highness the Czarewitch to political motives. We prefer to believe that the tour is intended to impart to His Imperial Highness' education that finish which otherwise it would have been wanting in. India is a vast continent inhabited by nationalities as different in race, religion and habits as any two different nations may well be. It boasts of a civilization that is unfortunately now lost, and a grandeur that is extinguished. Here in the different parts of the country you find at once the various climates of Europe; the Himálayas and the country surrounding them remind you of the frozen North, while lower down you feel the warmth of the sunny South. This will be an agreeable phenomenon for His Imperial Highness to observe. However, what will perhaps strike him most is the universal peace reigning throughout the land, and the spectacle of a heterogeneous people contented and loyal to the British Crown. His Imperial Highness will also notice the freedom which under British rule the Indians enjoy; it is the result of the confidence which the rulers have in course of time found the Indians worthy of. Education has already made rapid strides, and people have learnt gradually to demand from their rulers those popular rights which by their education and ability they think they are entitled to at the hands of an enlightened Government. They have evidently great confidence in the liberal instincts of the English nation, to whom they appeal for the redress of any grievance they may feel. Many Indians occupy high offices under the State in the Judicial, Revenue and Political Departments, in the Councils of Governors, and in the Council of the Viceroy. The Indian press has a freedom that was unknown before. All this, we repeat, is the result of mutual confidence between the rulers and the ruled, of a sympathy begotten of long association.

3. The Rást Goftár (89), in its issue of the 28th December, writes:—We expect that the visit of the Czarewitch to India will have a good educational effect upon His Imperial Highness. He will see that the British Government derives its strength from the diversity of races inhabiting it, as well as from their interested, and therefore staunch, loyalty. He may notice that although the masses are too ignorant to make any difference between one European power and another, they are perfectly contented under the just and peaceful rule of England. He may also see that those who declaim most strongly against particular measures of the Government and who demand most unreasonably the rights and privileges of popular government,—even these do not for a moment harbour a secret desire in their hearts for the subversion of British rule. It may be that imperfect, exaggerated, garbled and perverted reports may have travelled as far as Russia about the doings of the Indian National Congress. They may have created an impression that India is in a ferment of discontent against the British Government. If it had been possible for the Czarewitch to witness the proceedings of the Congress which is now holding its sittings in Calcutta, he would have seen with his own eyes that, with all its aberrations and excesses, it is not a seditious organization aiming against the British Government. Both Russia and England have their missions in Asia. The continent is large enough to give ample room to both. England has been nobly fulfilling her mission in the East. Russia has entered the field some two centuries after her great rival, and it will be some time before the world will have an opportunity of judging how she is acquitting herself of her task. With the advance of Russia the rival powers are gradually coming nearer to each other. The nearer they are the greater will be their circumspection and jealousy of each other; and in an international affair like this it will be a futile wish, though it may quite be a pious one, that the two powers may live ever in neighbourly peace and charity. The visit of the Czarewitch is to be welcomed as creating a friendly spirit between the two powers and cultivating a better understanding. These are forces which may either avert international complications, or prevent their assuming a form dangerous to the interests of peace.

4. The Indu Prakásh (15), in its issue of the 29th December, writes:—The political significance of the visit to India of His Imperial Highness the Czarewitch cannot be exaggerated. Too great reliance cannot, indeed, be placed upon such friendly and casual visits. At the same time we do not think there is any cause or justification for smelling any nefarious designs as being concealed under this simple incident. At any rate, it will serve no purpose to raise up imaginary spectres and to vex ourselves with fancying daggers where there are none. The truly prudent position is, as the Bombay Gazette points out, to "interpret this auspicious visit in a trustful and generous way." Lord Salisbury himself regards it as a pledge of peace, and there is no occasion for us to distress ourselves by distrusting his judgment. It is at least reasonable to think that the visit is prompted by a pure desire for travel and information and is encouraged by a feeling of confidence and esteem. The proofs of the strength of the British power which the distinguished visitors will see at every step, showing how broad-based it is on the love of the people, with what unquestioning faith and loyalty its sway is received throughout the country, and how little enthusiasm the presence of a foreign Prince excites among the people, will further dissipate from their minds all hostile thoughts, supposing that they entertained any. Thus in either case the eventual result of the visit will be more beneficial than otherwise. It is, indeed, much to be wished that the Princes be given the fullest opportunities of seeing India, especially the Native States. We have no fear about publicity of any kind. Both British and Native India will, we have every confidence, stand the test of such a scrutiny. It is often represented by irresponsible writers that in Russia a feeling prevails that the Native States are not on cordial terms with the British Government. We wish the States were given an opportunity to show what stuff their loyalty was made of. We are sure the foreign Princes will return to their country all the more convinced that the British power in India is impenetrable, and that the best policy for Russia is to remain a friendly ally of England.

His Imperial Highness the Czarewitch's visit to India and the absurd surmises made by the ignorant people about its object.

5. While writing upon the same subject, the Poona Vaibhav (55), in its issue of the 28th December, says:—Very funny rumours are current among ignorant people anent the visit of His Imperial Highness the Czarewitch to India. Some say that the Prince is on a reconnoitering tour. Others aver that he is held as a hostage by the English in connection with a treaty concluded between England and Russia. Some assert that it has been settled between Russia and England that they should rule over India alternately every five years, and that the Czarewitch has come to take possession of the country; while a few exercise their imagination to an absurd pitch and say that the Nána Sáheb of 1857 having fled to Russia, the Czar gave protection to him and promised him the restoration of his country, and that hence the Czarewitch has come to India with Nána Sáheb to make a survey of the jungles of the country with a view to approaching invasion, and that this is the reason why the Prince has visited the Elephanta, Ellora and other caves! These rumours are very amusing and are but a select few of the host of those current among the ignorant people.

The proceedings of the sixth Indian National Congress approved.

6. The Bombay Samáchár (96), in its issue of the 30th December, in approving the proceedings of the sixth Indian National Congress held at Calcutta, says:—The Congress did well in confirming the resolutions passed at its previous meetings, and in unanimously approving Mr. Bradlaugh's modified Bill for the expansion of the Imperial and Provincial Legislative Councils. This step will show the English public that the people of India are still anxious to obtain the several rights and concessions prayed for in the different resolutions. The Congress did still better in adopting two new resolutions, praying for the restoration to the members of the House of Commons of the right of stating in Parliament the grievances of the people of India before the Speaker leaves the chair, and for the presentation in Committee of the Indian budget statement and taking it up at such time as will ensure its full and adequate discussion. It is to be hoped that India will be soon fortunate enough to get all these concessions. [The Akhbáre Sodágar (94), in its issues of the 30th and 31st December, expresses similar sentiments.]

The sixth Indian National Congress considered a success.

7. The Native Opinion (17), in its issue of the 1st January, writes:—The sixth "unconventional convention" (to use the happy words of President Mehta) of the Indian Empire, has, thanks to the enlightened and civilizing influences of the British rule, met, has transacted its business, and has been dissolved to meet next year at Nágpur. Whether we look to the preparations made or to the number, education and position of the delegates, or to the tone of the proceedings or the resolutions passed, there can, we think, be no question that everything has passed off as satisfactorily as could be desired; and this is especially remarkable inasmuch as the number of delegates was curtailed, as was eminently advisable, at the previous session. The fears that were entertained in some quarters that this step would operate as a deterrent to the sustenance of popular interest in the movement have been proved to be groundless. The movement has, it can now safely be said, established its position, and nothing more, we think, is now necessary to plead for its retention as the best possible means for the articulation of the wants and wishes of the country. The speeches of Mr. Manmohan Ghose and President Mehta, who may be said to have surpassed themselves, have once more shattered to pieces the occasional imprudent and stupid allegations regarding the loyalty of the movement. The allegation against the national character of the movement has also been fully exposed, and similar has been the fate of the disgraceful attempt made in some quarters to dissuade the Pársis from joining it on the plea that they are not natives of the country. Nothing can be happier than the retort given by Mr. Mehta. He was equally happy in his survey of the stages through which the Congress has passed. His description of the wonderful ignorance that prevails amongst Englishmen about Indian questions, and of the procrastination which prevails at the head-quarters, was graphic. His rapid review of the position in which the Councils' reform question now stands, and his advice regarding the course which he thought the Congress should follow with reference to it, were equally masterly, prudent and statesmanlike. A number of other points were also ably touched, for which the speech itself must be perused. Nothing can be finer than the graceful compliments the President, as the mouthpiece of the Congress, paid to the magnificent services of Mr. Bradlaugh and Mr. Hume to the Indian cause, and the services rendered by the British Agency and the delegates who with self-sacrifice and zeal for their country crossed the seas to plead before the bar of English public opinion for their countrymen. The most important and novel resolution was the authority given for provisional arrangements for a Congress of not less than one hundred delegates in England in 1892, the several standing committees being directed to report at the next assembly the names of those whom they might propose to depute from their respective districts. It is to be seen how far this succeeds. It will involve very large expenditure, but there can be no doubt as to its efficacy in educating the English public in Indian questions. The meeting is sure to excite immense interest and we wish it entire success. The resolution is timely, for the period of two years will be quite necessary to mature the arrangements. All business on the addenda paper being over, the President, as usual, dissolved the sessions with three cheers for the Empress. All well and good so far; but we miss a resolution for the collection of money to defray the expenses of the Congress meeting in England in 1892. A very large amount will be required for this purpose. Taking the average expense per delegate at Rs. 1,500, including passage money, something like a lákh and a half of rupees will be required. The nation must pay this, for it will not do to saddle it upon the delegates. For the collection of such a large sum gigantic efforts will be necessary from this time throughout the length and breadth of the land and delay will be ruinous. No efforts should therefore be spared and no sum looked upon as too small.

Mr. P. M. Mehta's address as President of the sixth Indian National Congress.

8. The Subodh Patrika (19), in its issue of the 28th December, writes:—The sixth Indian National Congress commenced its sittings at Calcutta on Friday under the presidency of our talented and distinguished townsman, Mr. Pherozshah M. Mehta. The President's speech was equal to the occasion and was a fine specimen of impassioned oratory. In the course of it he reviewed the different stages through which the Congress has passed, and gave his reasons for the claims of that body to be regarded as a fit exponent of the views, wants and grievances of the people of this country. Two features of the speech are specially noticeable. One of them is the frank readiness with which Mr. Mehta has admitted, and wisely admitted we think, that the scheme for the reform of the Legislative Councils, which the Congress somewhat hastily and at the impetuous bidding of certain over-zealous delegates had adopted last year, was a mistake, and that the Congress has profited from the adverse criticisms passed during this year on that scheme, both in England and India. The other noticeable feature of the speech is the complimentary manner in which Mr. Mehta spoke of Lord Dufferin, admitting that that statesman had been misunderstood while in India. On the whole, Mr. Pherozshah's speech does credit to himself and to the Congress, and if the deliberations of that body are conducted in the spirit of moderation and thoughtfulness which characterises that speech, it will more than ever justify its claim to be a worthy exponent of India's political wants.

An answer to the detractors of the Indian National Congress.

9. The Dnyán Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 1st January, writes:—The Indian National Congress is said by its detractors to be a Hindu movement, a Congress of the Hindus, and especially of the Bengali Hindus, the Babus. If it be meant to simply suggest by such a statement that the number of Hindu delegates to the Congress meetings very largely preponderates that of the delegates of other religious persuasions, such a statement may be accepted as being true; but this needs scarcely be wondered at inasmuch as the Hindus form nearly four-fifths of the entire population of India, including Burmah. If, however, it is meant to insinuate anything else, then we must say that the insinuation is entirely groundless. That the Hindu delegates to the Congress meetings, though more numerous than the delegates of all other religious persuasions put together, only once in six years elected a Hindu gentleman to occupy the chair, proves conclusively to our mind that purely sectarian or religious views seldom, if ever, enter the minds of the modern educated classes of the Hindu community. On one occasion they elected a Mahomedan gentleman (Mr. Badrudin Tyabji), on two occasions Pársi gentlemen (Messrs. Dádábhái Navroji and Mehta) and on two occasions English gentlemen (Mr. Yule and Sir W. Wedderburn, Bart.) to be their President. The moral suggested by this incident is highly significant, and is, in our humble opinion, calculated to dissipate as groundless all apprehensions about Hindu representatives in the reformed representative Legislative Councils swamping the representatives of other religious persuasions.

The resolution to hold the eighth Indian National Congress in England heartily approved.

10. The Bombay Samáchár (96) and the Jáme Jamshed (110), in their respective issues of the 1st January, heartily approve of the resolutions of the sixth Indian National Congress to make arrangements to hold a Congress of not less than one hundred delegates in England in 1892, and observe that the convention is sure to enlighten the English nation on the true aims and designs of the Congress and to secure their sympathy for this movement.

Condemnation of the circular of the Bengal Government prohibiting their servants from attending the Congress meetings.

11. With reference to the circular of the Bengal Government prohibiting Government servants from attending the Congress, the Bombay Samáchár (96), in its issue of the 31st December, says:—The Congress ought not to adopt drastic measures in connection with the circular, the existence of which ought to be overlooked. The Congress is composed of loyal subjects of the British Crown, who ought to adopt every right means to secure the full confidence of Government in regard to the aims and actions of this loyal movement, which is intended for the good both of the public and of Government.

12. The Jáme Jamshed (110), in its issue of the same date, observes:—When the circular of the Bengal Government prohibiting their servants from attending the meetings of the Indian National Congress comes to the notice of the English people, they are sure to exclaim that in no part of the British Empire other than India can such an order exist. Certainly, the Congress cannot be accused by Government or anybody else of being disloyal, and there is evidently no need of this offensive circular. If Government do not object to offensive remarks being made at St. Andrew's annual dinner, which has been given the form of a political banquet, where the high officials of Government unfavourably criticise the policy and actions of the administration, why should Government assume an offensive posture towards the Indian National Congress, whose aims and acts are extremely loyal and beneficial to the public and Government? How were the remarks addressed at the banquets held in honour of Mr. H. S. King, M.P., by the members of the Indian uncovenanted civil service in different parts of the country mutely put up with? The action which the Congress intends to take in connection with the circular is appropriate and deserves every support from the public.

13. The Kesari (44), in its issue of the 30th December, observes:—It is very surprising that a prohibition to enter even the precincts of the Indian National Congress hall has been issued by men brought up in a free atmosphere. God knows whether it will be considered hereafter a great sin to read a newspaper containing writings about the Congress or to utter the word Congress. How far a Government ordering its servants not to do certain things during the Christmas holidays, will dispassionately consider the legitimate demands of the Congress, goes without saying. But we must not lose courage. The matter must be taken over to England. Unless taken to task by the proper authorities the irresponsible Indian Government is not likely to act within due bounds.

The proceedings at the fourth meeting of the Social Conference approved.

14. The Bombay Samáchár (96), in its issue of the 3rd January, approves of the proceedings at the fourth meeting of the Social Conference held on the 28th ultimo at Calcutta, observing that the social reformers have done well in removing the differences of opinion that arose among themselves and adopting the wise course of not seeking State aid or legal enactments for the removal of social evils and the advancement of social reform.—The Jáme Jamshed (110), in its issue of the 30th December, advises the reformers to effect gradual progress by staunchly enlightening the Hindu public on the shortcomings of the community and by gaining them over to the cause of advancement, themselves practising the reforms that are preached by them.

Comments on the New Year's honours list.

15. The Bombay Samáchár (96), in its issue of the 3rd January, says:—The New Year's honours list is disappointing as regards India in general and the Bombay Presidency in particular. Those who have obtained honours are to be congratulated, but it is to be noted with regret that many deserving persons have been unjustly omitted from the same favour. There is not a single Native gentleman among those honoured with the Star of India, while two Natives only have been rewarded with the honour of the Indian Empire. Certainly there are many deserving Native gentlemen who could be well favoured with these honours. A few have received the titles of Rája, Ráo Sáheb and Khán Sáheb, but they are of little consequence. The investment of the Thákor of Bhávnagar with the title of Mahárája does not strike one as distinctive, as His Highness has been already styled Mahárája in talk and writing. Dr. Theodore Cooke, Principal of the College of Science at Poona, is the only gentleman of the Bombay Presidency who has received, and deservedly, the honour of the Companion of the Indian Empire. There has been thus unadvised stinginess in the bestowal of these honours.—The Jáme Jamshed (110), in its issues of the 2nd and 3rd January, says that the bestowal of the honours, so far as Natives are concerned and as regards the Bombay Presidency, has been unduly sparing, and observes:—This year's honours list once more shows that these honours are specially reserved for Government officers and Native Chiefs and Princes. Among the ten recipients of the honour of C.I.E. there is only one Native gentleman, Diwán Bahádur Rám Ráo, Diwán of Travancore, and it is quite strange that there should be found none in the vast British Indian territories deserving of similar favour. While in England the benefactors of the public are admitted to high honours, in India such persons have been for some time past omitted, and Government officers and Native Chiefs alone recognized as deserving persons. This regret is mixed with the gratification that the single fortunate gentleman of this presidency found deserving of the honour of C.I.E. is Dr. Theodore Cooke, whose important services to the cause of technical education are appropriately highly valued by the public.

16. The Indu Prakásh (15), in its issue of the 29th December, says:—We are not surprised at the Government having declined to sanction the opening of a military school in the Panjáb, but we are sorry for it. Sanction to this school must have been refused on the same ground on which it was refused to a similar school at Poona. Some people say that Government have resolved not to confer high military posts on natives of India under any circumstances, and that therefore it is useless to train up the children of the Native Princes and nobility in military discipline. But we think that in order to compel Government to fulfil the promise which they have made and left unfulfilled for years past, that they will confer places under Government on all persons qualified to hold them, independently of their creed or colour, military schools should be established and youths of nobility trained up therein, and the Government authorities should be put to shame for not conferring high military posts on Native youths. This is the way to the accomplishment of our object, and therefore the idea of establishing such schools should not be given up.

The question about the establishment of military schools in India and the Government.

17. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 28th December, writes:—There was only one recommendation of the Factory Commission on which there was want of unanimity of opinion among the members, and that was with regard to the question whether the eleven hours' limit recommended for women workers should be made compulsory. Our distinguished Bombay citizen, Mr. S. S. Bengalee, differed from his colleagues on this point. In his opinion, which is entitled to great weight on account of his varied experience, a permissary provision would work no good, as, not unnaturally, he was afraid that it would be unduly taken advantage of. In this state of things the local Government wisely sought the opinion of another presumably experienced citizen of Ahmedabad, Mr. Ranchhodlál, and from inquiries made on the spot he was able to bring to light the fact that among the Waghri women and hand-loom-weavers the hours of work were and are more than eleven. This piece of evidence, startling even to some of us, throws a flood of light on more questions than one. It shows how mischievous are the persisting efforts of those of our friends in Lancashire who press the Government of India to adopt wholesale the resolutions of the Berlin Conference. It also suggests the extremely low price of labour in this country. Is any other evidence necessary to prove the utter poverty of the Indian masses?

Remarks in connection with the recommendations of the Indian Factory Commission.

18. The same newspaper writes:—On the policy of recognising merit wherever it is found, we fully endorse all the good things that have been said of late by some of our contemporaries with regard to the valuable services of Mr. Nugent, Chief Secretary to the Bombay Government, especially in connection with the employment of University men in the Secretariat and the Revenue Department. Mr. Nugent has always been reputed to be a man of strong convictions and fearless independence—qualities extremely valuable in one placed so high. However greatly we might differ from him in his abkári and forest policy, we have no hesitation in saying that the Government of India has made a wise selection in calling him temporarily to their aid, and thereby giving due recognition to his arduous labours in connection with the Crawford scandal.

Approval of the appointment of Mr. Nugent as an additional member of the Viceroy's Legislative Council.

19. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 28th December, writes:—We confess it is hard to see the justice of the action taken by the Panjáb Government in dismissing Mr. Drysdale, one of their police officers, for preaching Christianity. Here is a valuable servant of the State, and a popular officer, who is forced to resign because he preached what he conceived to be the true gospel during his leisure Whom did Mr. Drysdale hurt by the procedure? Compare this attitude of the Christian British Government with its attitude towards servants who are known to lead a disreputable life, are heavily indebted and otherwise obnoxious to the people. How slow are the authorities in dealing with actual delinquency! We are constrained to say that we distrust a policy that seeks to conciliate blind prejudice. The Queen's Proclamation is to be applied to such cases, not so much in the letter as in the spirit, and always, we submit, in the interests of progress and enlightenment. In the present case, we are not sure if Mr. Drysdale has not been punished for what many other worthy servants of Government do almost every Sunday. For instance, they do not dismiss a Brahmo official for preaching the tenets of his religion to the people. Surely, Government do not believe that Brahmoism is less obnoxious to the orthodox Hindu or Mahomedan than Christianity?

20. The Gujaráti (85), in its issue of the 21st December, says that it has received a communication to the following effect:—Mr. Weir, Assistant Collector, Kaira, while on a visit of inspection to the village of Sháhápura in the Thásra sub-division of the district, having sent for the Taláti of the village, the latter came and made a salam to the Assistant Collector with his country shoes on. This displeased Mr. Weir very much, who, having ordered a large stone, told the Taláti to stand upon it and to put his own shoes on his own head; and the Taláti having refused to do so, the Assistant Collector ordered a man of the Ravania caste to put the Taláti's shoes on his head, and made an exhibition of him in that state to the rayats who had gathered there for the verification of their receipt-books. It is said that the Taláti has been fined by the Assistant Collector and has made petitions to the District Collector and the Divisional Commissioner on the subject of his treatment by Mr. Weir.—While commenting on this matter, the Poona Vaibhav (55), in its issue of the 28th December, considers this to be an instance of the high-handed manner in which persons are often treated under the British Government as if they were under the Mogul administration.—The Svadesh Bandhu (134) of the 31st December states that the Taláti, Mr. Bholábhái, is said to have withdrawn his petitions, and the Assistant Collector to have remitted the fine and tendered an apology.

A complaint against Ráo Sáheb Manishankar, Mámlatdár of táluka Dholka in the Ahmedabad District.

21. A correspondent of the Praja Mat (121), in its issue of the 27th December, complains that Ráo Sáheb Manishankar, Mámlatdár of táluka Dholka, Ahmedabad District, works in his office as late as 11 at night, thereby putting parties to great inconvenience. The Praja Mat observes that at the editor's recent visit to Dholka the Mámlatdár was found conducting the business of his Court till a very late hour at night, and that some of the parties were heard complaining that they were attending the Court regularly for nearly two weeks.

Alleged injustice done to a compounder in the Sir J. J. Hospital, Bombay.

22. The Native Opinion (17), in its issue of the 1st January, writes:—A singular case has recently occurred in our midst. We do not know whether it is a rule at the Grant Medical College, Bombay, that unless a prescription, though given by one of the Professors under his signature, is seen by the House Surgeon, it ought not to be dispensed. On the receipt of such a prescription, under the signature of Dr. K. N. Bahádurji, a compounder named Mr. Govind Ganesh Kákade dispensed it. The House Surgeon, according to the version of the compounder, getting vexed, fined him in the sum of Rs. 3. Feeling annoyed at the attitude of the House Surgeon and afraid, perhaps, that similar obedience would again be misconstrued and would cost him his post, Mr. Kákade resigned it and got another post under Dr. Pichey-Phipson at the Kama Hospital. Somehow or other Mr. Kákade's new appointment was not approved of by the Surgeon-General, though he was appealed to do justice in the case. Thus here is a man who for the execution of duty in obedience to the instructions of his superior is fined for no fault of his and is denied a bare act of justice. Taking these facts as true, could not Dr. Bahádurji have interfered in the matter and protected a compounder from the unmeaning ire of his superior? But somehow the doctor does not seem to have taken up the case, otherwise his intervention might have done some good to the poor compounder. Mr. Kákade's appeal to Government in the matter has done him no good, and the poor man loses his bread simply for the vagary of an official superior. We have never come across an instance in which a man lost his employment for the simple act of obedience to his superior. Instead of inflicting a fine upon this helpless man, the best way for the House Surgeon was to protest against Dr. Bahádurji, but the poor compounder finds himself between two stools and becomes the victim of officialism that is neither just, generous, nor reasonable.

Mr. Hormasji Dádábhái Pleader recommended for the Fourth Judgeship of the Small Causes Court, Bombay, vacated by the death of Mr. Pinhey.

23. The Bombay Samáchár (96), the Jáme Jamshed (110), and the Akhbáre Sodágar (94), in their issues of the 30th December, record with much regret the death of Mr. R. W. S. Pinhey, Fourth Judge of the Small Causes Court, Bombay, and recommend that the vacancy be filled by the appointment of Mr. Hormasji Dádábhái Pleader, who, they say, has several times ably discharged the duties of an acting Judge of the Court, giving entire satisfaction to Government and the public.

A suggestion in connection with the location of a new Civil Court.

24. The Dhárwár Vritt (32), in its issue of the 1st January, approves of the proposal to establish a new Civil Court with a view to lessen the work of the Subordinate Judge's Court at Háveri, but disapproves of its intended location at Ránebennur, saying that it would be more convenient to the people to locate it either at Bankápur or Hángal, and requests Government to consider this suggestion.

Complaint of the people in the Dhárwár District about the loss caused by the Engineering Department.

25. The Rasik Ranjani (144), in its issue of the 18th December, says that several rayats were much ruined by the construction of the S. M. Railway in consequence of their fields, the sole means of their livelihood, being taken by the company for laying down rail-road and by their not being granted adequate compensation; that a fresh loss is about to be inflicted upon them by the Engineering Department inasmuch as new roads leading to the railway stations are being planned and constructed through their fields between the villages of Kalalkond and Hattimattur in the Karajgi Táluka in the Dhárwár District, and that gross injustice is done to them as the District Collector takes no notice of their complaints, though he has been petitioned on that head several times.

26. A correspondent of the Ahmedabad Times (92), in its issue of the 30th December, complains that several thefts and robberies have been of late committed in the Mátar Táluka of the Kaira District, and says that the police have failed to make proper enquiries into them and that if any one lodges a complaint before them, he is, it is said, put to vexation and made to withdraw the complaint. The Police Superintendent is requested to enquire into the matter.

Negligence of the police authorities at Mahudha in the Kaira District.

27. The Svadesh Bandhu (135), in its issue of the 31st December, says that several thefts have occurred in the town of Mahudha in the Kaira District during the past few days owing to the negligence of the police, and requests the Police Superintendent to take steps in the matter.

PART II.—Education.

Approval of the appointment of Mr. Justice Birdwood as Vice-Chancellor of the Bombay University.

28. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 28th December, writes:—We are glad to learn that the vacancy in the University created by Dr. Wordsworth's retirement has been filled in such a satisfactory manner. A happier selection it would, indeed, have been difficult to make. Himself a distinguished University man and a true lover of learning, Mr. Justice Birdwood has for several years past taken a deep and abiding interest in the well-being of the Bombay University. At the sacrifice of very valuable private time, which evidently he could ill spare, he has devoted himself, heart and soul, to maintaining and increasing the prestige and dignity of that distinguished body; and it has been rightly observed that the only wonder is that his undoubted claims to the honour and responsibility were not earlier acknowledged. His great learning and greater administrative capacities, especially at a time when the University Reform Bill is before the Senate, will be simply invaluable. We therefore feel the more persuaded to congratulate the University upon the great honour and greater service it has done to the Government by asking the learned Judge to stand practically at the helm of her affairs.

Suggestions in connection with the appointment of new Fellows of the Bombay University.

29. The Native Opinion (17), in its issue of the 28th December, writes:—Now that the time for nomination of new Fellows of our University is very near, we take the liberty of making certain suggestions to our esteemed and popular Vice-Chancellor as well as to Government. Last year we had suggested the names of certain well-known Gujaráti gentlemen as deserving of the honour of Fellowship, and were much gratified to find that from amongst them Mr. Mansukhlál Munshi, B.A., LL.B., Solicitor, and Mr. S. G. Jinsiwále, M.A., were nominated. We now strongly urge again upon Government the claims of the other gentlemen we recommended last year, but who have not yet got the honour, viz., Mr. Chimanlál Harilál Setalvad, B.A., LL.B., Pleader, High Court, and Mr. T. K. Gajjar, M.A., whose efforts in the cause of education have resulted in the establishment of a Technical Institute at Baroda. As the number of Gujaráti Senators is comparatively small, we urge upon Government the necessity of making the above two additions. Among the Deccanis we take the liberty of suggesting the names of Mr. L. R. Vaidya, M.A., LL.B., Advocate, High Court, and Professor of Sanskrit, Elphinstone College, Mr. G. S. Ráo, M.A., LL.B., Mr. B. G. Tilak, B.A., LL.B., Mr. Káshináth Balvant Pendse, M.A., and Mr. G. M. Sáthe, B.A., Reporter on the Native Press. We see no reason why the Mahámahopádhyáyas Rájárám Shástri and Bhimáchárya of the Elphinstone College may not be made Fellows.

30. The Hitechchhu (87) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 1st January, observes:—It is much to be regretted that though on the Senate of the Bombay University the Hindu Gujaráti communities have only 20 representatives, some of them do not seem to take active interest in the affairs of the University. A rule may be made that the names of gentlemen neglecting to attend a certain number of University meetings should be struck off the list of Fellows. Members of Municipal School Boards who take an intelligent part in their duties should be nominated Fellows. Mr. Kálábhái Lallubhái, a well-known pleader and chairman of the School Board Committee at Surat, takes much interest in educational matters and richly deserves to be made a Fellow. Messrs. Chimanlál Harilál Setalvad, B.A., LL.B., and Manilál Gangádás Desái, L.M. & S., are well-known in their respective professions. Mr. Setalvad has written several useful works and was Examiner in Gujaráti at the Matriculation and School Final Examinations more than once.

New Arts curriculum of the Bombay University.

31. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 28th December, writes:—At the meeting of the Senate of the Bombay University held on Saturday the 20th instant, the changes recommended by the Syndicate in the Arts course were finally adopted. The four-years' course begins this year and the first Previous Examination according to the new course will be held in November 1891. We are sorry Mr. Sayani was induced to withdraw his amendment introducing vernacular translations into the new curriculum. This partial introduction of the vernaculars would, no doubt, have been piecemeal reform. Something however is better than nothing. If, however, some movement is likely to be made and the question of the vernaculars is expected to come before the Syndicate anew, we have patience enough to wait. The Honourable Mr. Justice Telang, who moved the resolution at the last meeting, hinted to that effect and we can therefore rest assured. The Indian Universities ought to do something in the way of encouraging the vernaculars of the land. We may be allowed to make a passing remark here that the viva voce examinations that are conducted in the Arts examinations have become a source of annoyance and trouble to the candidates, and we suggest that the Syndicate may see its way to their abolition. Now that one independent paper in English composition is to be set, there appears to be no necessity for viva voce examinations.

PART III.—Railways.

Representation of the Bombay Chamber of Commerce to open feeder railway lines in Gujarát and Khándesh supported.

32. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 28th December, writes:—The Bombay Chamber of Commerce, always distinguished for its timely action, has recently sent in a representation to the local Government, asking them to encourage by every possible means the extension of feeder lines in Gujarát and Khándesh. Confining our remarks to the latter district, we are fully of opinion that a branch line from Manmád to Dhulia, and thence to Nandurbár, would open up large parts of the district and would give no slight encouragement to agriculture in the far-off tálukas where lands have remained uncultivated for want of suitable means of transport. Khándesh is a large cotton centre, and nothing would give greater facilities to its growth of cotton even on a more extended scale than a feeder railway that could tap many new parts of the Collectorate. Now that the project of an extension from Chálisgaon to Dhulia is finally disapproved of, the timely and practicable suggestion of the Chamber of Commerce will, we trust, receive favourable and prompt consideration at the hands of the authorities. At present Dhulia is perhaps the only zilla station on this side of the presidency not connected by railway. This, we deem, is an additional reason of no small significance that ought to weigh with the Government in disposing of the recommendation. [The Hindusthán (109), in its issue of the same date, expresses approval of the recommendation of the Chamber of Commerce to construct feeder lines in Gujarát, observing that they would contribute to the prosperity of the province.]

PART IV.—Municipalities.

Disapproval of the conduct of the Government of India towards the Bombay Municipal Corporation in the matter of Tansa loans.

33. The Rást Goftár (89), in its issue of the 28th December, writes:—The ways of the Government of India in matters of finance are mysterious, not only to their subjects but to themselves. That there is absolutely no financial system in the country is a matter of daily observation. We need go no further for an example than the servants of the State. The State servants are always in trouble of some kind, either about their salaries or pensions, and are always succeeding in getting their Government to alter the rules in favour of increases, of course. There is neither rule, finality, nor system in this matter. It is similar in the land tax of the country, in the ábkári, and in many other branches. The absence of system in finance is carried also into the municipal organization of the country with reference to loans. Not a single existing municipality knows how, when or what it may borrow, or how, when or what it may be required to pay for any loan. It is all a matter of toss-up. All this financial mischief is due to the absence of rule and principles. It has taken the Government of India twenty years to study the system on which municipalities shall be allowed to raise loans, and it has not got beyond the "goose step" in financial drill. Every application for a loan has to run the gauntlet of a financial tyro, and hence loans are allowed to be raised on conditions as variable as possible, on the principle, we suppose, that "variety is charming." We are led into this very brief review of the financial policy or the financial system of the Government of India by reason of the extraordinary manner in which the Government has dealt with the Bombay Corporation in the matter of the loan for the great Tansa water-works. The Government of India first sanctions a Municipal Act for Bombay in which it is declared that "money may be borrowed for such time, not exceeding sixty years, as the Corporation, with the sanction of Government, determine in each case." This is fairly good law as thus expressed, and it practically means that the agreement between these two contracting parties signifies that the power of sanction rests with the Government of India. It also may be inferred from this law that Government are entitled to exercise their sanctioning power at each loan. But this in-himself, heart and soul, to maintaining and increasing the prestige and dignity of that distinguished body; and it has been rightly observed that the only wonder is that his undoubted claims to the honour and responsibility were not earlier acknowledged. His great learning and greater administrative capacities, especially at a time when the University Reform Bill is before the Senate, will be simply invaluable. We are led into this very brief review of the financial policy or the financial system of the Government of India by reason of the extraordinary manner in which the Government has dealt with the Bombay Corporation in the matter of the loan for the great Tansa water-works. The Government of India first sanctions a Municipal Act for Bombay in which it is declared that "money may be borrowed for such time, not exceeding sixty years, as the Corporation, with the sanction of Government, determine in each case." This is fairly good law as thus expressed, and it practically means that the agreement between these two contracting parties signifies that the power of sanction rests with the Government of India. It also may be inferred from this law that Government are entitled to exercise their sanctioning power at each loan. But this inference is altogether a mistaken one, as exemplified in the matter of the Tansa loan. The Government of India sanctioned that loan in parts of 47 and 76 lákhs. The first part of the loan was allowed to run for 60 years and the second part was restricted to 40 years. The interval between the sanction of these two parts of one loan was very brief, being only two years. Our readers will naturally ask whether any financial cataclysm occurred during these two years. Were the lending banks more difficult to manage? Had the credit or the income of the Corporation been reduced? Had India been overtaken by famine? Nothing of this kind had occurred. On the contrary, the lending banks were anxious to lend the second part of the loan on the same terms as they lent the first part, viz., for sixty years, and the income and the credit of the municipality had increased, and yet the Government of India persisted in making the second part of the loan run for a period of forty years, after strong remonstrance offered by the Corporation of Bombay. The extraordinary features of this policy bring its own condemnation on the decision of the Government of India. The decision is not only arbitrary, but unjust. We have said that the first part of the Tansa loan was granted for sixty years and the second part for forty years. A third part must now be raised for unforeseen excesses in the expenditure on the works. When this third loan is applied for, may not the Government of India sanction it for thirty years? Not only may it do so, but there is not the smallest guarantee that it will not. It is undoubtedly a great point which was urged before the Corporation by Dr. Blaney that a single generation should be called upon to pay the entire cost of a work which will last for twenty generations, and which will be a productive work to those generations. If it be granted that the present generation will receive the water revenue accruing from the Tansa works, it must also be remembered that every penny of that revenue and a great deal more will be required to pay the interest and annual instalments on the loans, whereas our immediate posterity, having no loan to pay off, will contribute the water-rates to themselves, or, putting the matter in another way, they will get their water for nothing and will only be required to pay for the maintenance of the works. If the refusal of the Government of India to grant an extended period for repaying the Tansa loan was based on the reason that Government should lose something by extending the time, the refusal might be understood. But the Government of India being asked only a grace and for nothing tangible or substantial, the Bombay Corporation cannot understand the refusal. That body has, therefore, declined to quietly accept what they believe to be a wrong decision, and one which, if persisted in, will probably exercise a pernicious influence in all the advanced municipalities in India. The Bombay Corporation engaged in the greatest municipal work in India on the understanding that the loan would run for sixty years. They based their future finance on that understanding, and having got fairly on with the work they find their future budgets will be seriously deranged by the curtailment of the period for which 100 lákhs of the loan is to run. In all future applications for loans by municipalities it will be necessary to secure the sanction of a uniform period for each loan. It is impossible to work on an up and down system such as the Government of India has introduced into the Tansa loan. It has been suggested that Bombay does not always receive the treatment at the hands of the Government of India accorded to some other parts of the Empire—say, Calcutta and Burmah. If this is a fact in Indian history, it is one which renders a change in the existing details of Government necessary. The towns, the cities, the people, and the Government should be one and inseparable; favouritism must prove a rank and noxious weed in the soil of India. The Bombay Corporation intend to push their representations about the disturbing and depressing influences of the Tansa loan with the Government of India. This is well, and we commend the Corporation for its worthy action. Shall we not wish a complete success to the deputation that hopes to meet the Viceroy in February next? The deputation should be able to show the Viceroy very strong reasons for relaxing the severe restriction of making the Tansa loan run over a period of one generation.

34. The Gujaráti (85), in its issue of the 28th December, writes:—We are glad to learn that a strong deputation of Municipal Councillors is to wait upon the Viceroy early next February with a view to induce the Government of India to extend to 80 years or 100 the time over which the Tansa loans should run. The case is so obviously clear that it is not easy to understand why the Government of India should have so long refused to concede the request of the Corporation. The Tansa loans extend to krors of rupees, and it is not possible for the Corporation, having other demands to satisfy, to repay the loans within such a short period as 40 years. We have no doubt the deputation, which consists of first-rate local financiers and politicians, will be able to place the matter in its proper light before His Excellency the Viceroy so as to induce him to grant the concession asked for. [The Kaiser-i-Hind (88), in its issue of the same date expresses similar sentiments.]

Inability of the Sátára Municipality to bear the whole of the expenses of the coming census and the refusal of the Bombay Government to pay half of them.

35. The Shubh Suchak (67), in its issue of the 26th December, says that it does not understand why the Bombay Government has refused to pay the Sátára Municipality half of the expenses the latter will have to incur on account of the coming census, when the Bengal Government is said to have promised the Calcutta Municipality to bear a moiety. Why should the municipality, asks the paper, bear the expenses of an imperial duty like the census? It remarks that the Sátára Municipality, being in a very poor condition and heavily indebted on account of the Káss water-works, it is very oppressive to burden it with the whole of the census expenditure.

Complaint about the imposition of a toll tax at Mehmadabad.

36. The Kaira Vartamán (112), in its issue of the 31st December, complains that a toll tax is levied at Mehmadabad, Kaira District, as many times as a cart happens to pass and repass the toll gate in a day, and says that it is not fair to levy this tax on cultivators as they pay local cess from which these roads are constructed, that they ought to be exempted from the tax, and that if this cannot be done its incidence should be lightened.

ference is altogether a mistaken one, as exemplified in the matter of the Tansa loan. The Government of India sanctioned that loan in parts of 47 and 76 lákhs. The first part of the loan was allowed to run for 60 years and the second part was restricted to 40 years. The interval between the sanction of these two parts of one loan was very brief, being only two years. Our readers will naturally ask whether any financial cataclysm occurred during these two years. Were the lending banks more difficult to manage? Had the credit or the income of the Corporation been reduced? Had India been overtaken by famine? Nothing of this kind had occurred. On the contrary, the lending banks were anxious to lend the second part of the loan on the same terms as they lent the first part, viz., for sixty years, and the income and the credit of the municipality had increased, and yet the Government of India persisted in making the second part of the loan run for a period of forty years, after strong remonstrance offered by the Corporation of Bombay. The extraordinary features of this policy bring its own condemnation on the decision of the Government of India. The decision is not only arbitrary, but unjust. We have said that the first part of the Tansa loan was granted for sixty years and the second part for forty years. A third part must now be raised for unforeseen excesses in the expenditure on the works. When this third loan is applied for, may not the Government of India sanction it for thirty years? The Resident's tour in Berár and the miseries it is alleged to entail on the people.

1. A correspondent, writing from Bassim to the Berár Samáchár (3) in its issue of the 29th December, says that preparations are being very actively made by the village officers, under the orders of the Deputy Commissioner and the Tahsildár, for the reception of the Resident, that private individuals find it very hard to purchase fuel for their own use and fodder for their cattle as all suppliers of these articles are forcibly taken to the Chávdi and their stocks are purchased by the authorities, that persons coming to the town on business are, without looking to their position, indiscriminately compelled to work in connection with the grand preparations which are in course, and that consequently much distress is felt in the town on account of the expected arrival of the Resident, whose advent would otherwise have been a matter for rejoicing to the people.

2. The same newspaper, referring to the above communication, observes :— We beg to direct the attention of the Commissioner to what our Bassim correspondent has said with regard to the Resident's tour in the province. It is often good to look behind the curtain. The whole affair will bring upon the officers curses and unkind words of the poor labourers. Upon them also they are thrown helplessly for help. The officers of higher grades, including Deputy Commissioners, Police Superintendents, Tahsildárs, &c., depend upon the work of the petty servants. The latter are dishonestly ignorant of what they do and make others do work for them. This is a good deal unavoidable and will continue to the end of the world ; but much will be mended by the Commissioner's care and caution. If the Commissioner sees personally with the aid of his staff that due wages and prices are paid for services and things, it would be quite enough.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

1. The Bombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 5th January, says:—

Surmises about the object of His Imperial Highness the Czarewitch's Indian tour.

The visit of His Imperial Highness the Czarewitch has given rise to various speculations among the Natives. The educated and knowing men are well aware that there is no political or mysterious meaning in the Russian Prince's Indian tour, which is made in accordance with the fashion obtaining among the European princes to gather instruction by travels in the different countries of the world, and that the Czarewitch is welcomed in India in a princely manner in compliance with general rules of hospitality. The report that the Czarewitch is to go as far as Peshawar and that Sir Frederick Roberts is to accompany him has led some persons to surmise that this is intended to carry out the object of the English and the Russians to divide between themselves Persia and Afghanistan; and it is desirable that this wrong impression should be contradicted authoritatively. Vague surmises of the ignorant portion of the Native public are amusing. Some of them suppose that the Czarewitch's Indian tour has been undertaken with a sinister object, pity the English for their ignorance, and observe that after the conclusion of his visit India will be invaded by a Russian army commanded by the Czarewitch; while others fancy that the princely hospitality shown to him is owing to the fear entertained of him by the English Government. It is the duty of the educated Natives to disabuse the minds of their ignorant brethren of these false impressions.

2. The Gujaráti (84), in its issue of the 4th January, writes:—The visit of His Imperial Highness the Czarewitch to several streets of Bombay incognito, and his brother's stay on board the S. S. "Azova" in the harbour on the ground of illness, have given rise to the rumours that the former intended to get a personal inspection of the people, while the latter wanted to examine minutely the situation and surroundings of the harbour; that the object of the British Government in showing royal hospitality to the Czarewitch is to please powerful Russia; and that it is with a view to impress on her mind the great loyalty of the Native States to the British Government that the former have been asked to receive the Prince in a splendid manner. Some people in India do not believe with Lord Salisbury that the visit of the Princes will serve as a pledge of peace, and, on the contrary, fear unpleasant complications. The absence of the brother of the Czarewitch from the latter's tour in India is considered a stroke of policy, since it is believed it would be unsafe for the two brothers to travel together in a foreign country. We believe that Russia cannot be expected to forget so soon her hostilities of long standing to the British, and cannot therefore dismiss all these rumours as groundless; nor can we say that the British are not at all afraid of Russia.

3. The Native Opinion (16), in its issue of the 4th January, writes:—

Remarks on the New Year's honours.

The Advocate of India has done well to raise its voice against a monopoly of the honours for the current year. The shower is neither copious nor equally distributed; it is confined, with some two or three exceptions, to the official world, as if there were no non-official Europeans nor Natives of position, on whom a few honours could be fittingly bestowed. We need not say that the object of these honours is the recognition of services rendered to the State, either directly or indirectly, by persons who receive no pecuniary recompense for them. Viewed in this light no sane man will ever condescend to look upon the present conferment of honours as impartial. Are we to believe that with the above exceptions no non-official European nor independent Native gentleman could be found throughout the length and breadth of India on whom these honours could be conferred? We are not prepared to say that honours should be withheld from officials, but we do protest against their distribution amongst officials in preference to those who are not officials. Government is all-powerful to do what it likes, but, on principle, even Government will have to admit that this year's bestowal is a breach of the above-mentioned principle. Out of the whole range of non-official Europeans Mr. Mackay alone comes in for a K.C.S.I., be it for his powerful attack on the financial policy of Government or for anything else.

As to Natives, with the exception of Madras none enters the sacred pale of the order of Star of India. Mostly these matters are managed, we believe, in the Secretariat, for which we cannot find fault with the head of the Government; but whose soever the fault, Government ought to quietly rectify it at least next year.

4. In alluding to the New Year's Honours Gazette and the personal distinction of 'Mahárája' bestowed on His Highness the Thákor of Bhávnagar, the Gujaráti (84), in its issue of the 4th January, observes:—The Thákor has not recently rendered any special service to his subjects or to the British Government so as to merit this recognition, and his liberal contributions to public funds raised in the British territory give him no title to it. Nor is the honour of K.C.I.E. bestowed on the Mahárája of Benares appropriate. The order of C.I.E. was originally intended for non-officials, but it is to be regretted that this rule has not been observed in practice and the honour is generally conferred on officials. We trust the authorities will show better judgment in future in conferring new year's honours.

5. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 5th January, writes:—The honours' list of the New Year's day is for us in Bombay more than ordinarily barren. The only recipient among the higher honours is Dr. T. Cooke, who gets a C.I.E. Dr. Cooke's selection is a thoroughly deserving one. But we wonder Government could not find any other individual, European or Native, worthy of recognition.

The reported massacre of Red Indian women and children and the fear it engenders.

6. The Poona Vaibhav (54), in its issue of the 4th January, refers to the telegraphic intelligence received from London concerning the massacre of three hundred women and children of the Red American Indians by the Christian settlers in North America, directs the attention of those who blame Nána Sáheb Peshwa for having killed English women and children in the Indian Mutiny of 1857 to this massacre by civilized Christians, and says that this occurrence is very frightful and has instilled fear into the mind of the people and the Government of India that the people of India might be similarly annihilated and extirpated by Englishmen if the latter are allowed to settle here in large numbers.

Government and the Indian National Congress.

7. While writing about the recent meeting of the Indian National Congress at Calcutta, the Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 5th January, observes:—The order which Government have issued prohibiting Government servants from attending political meetings is very ungenerous and does not befit them. We have hopes that it will be cancelled some time or other. Really speaking, this order is a great mistake. Nobody will mind an injunction against doing a thing which thousands of educated people are bent on doing, and all precautions taken to prohibit it will be futile. If educated Natives are quite impressed with the salutary effects of the National Congress on the welfare of the country they will never fail to assist and promote its cause secretly and indirectly, if not openly and directly. If they render such assistance, no blame will attach to them in the opinion of sensible men. Public good is always preferred to private interests among educated and civilized nations, and if the British Government is desirous of securing good name in the world in connection with Indian administration, it should encourage among the people of India a desire to devote themselves to public good. We therefore, at the beginning of this new year, pray God that He may create in the British people a desire to do away with such orders and regulations showing a spirit of partiality to themselves as may have crept into their administration of India and to accept the ways and means proposed by the National Congress for promoting the interests of the country directly and of England indirectly.

8. The Phœnix (5), in its issue of the 7th January, says:—However wise it may be to prevent Government servants from taking any part in the deliberations of the Indian National Congress, there is no justification for authoritatively forbidding their attendance even as visitors. The Subjects Committee of the Congress were thus compelled to take notice of the matter, and Mr. Ghose, the Chairman of the Committee, moved a resolution in the Congress authorising the President to submit a memorial to the Viceroy protesting against the orders of the Government of India. Mr. Yule seconded the resolution, and his speech was a robust and dignified protest against the action of the Government of India. There would be some shadow of justification if the orders of Government were applicable to all political meetings held under any garb, but if Government officials can take part in political meetings of one kind there is absolutely no reason why they should not be present even as visitors at meetings of another kind. The St. Andrew's dinner, for instance, has become a purely political function, and Government officials do not hesitate to unburden themselves of their political opinions on the occasion. Mr. Yule rightly resented the implied insult in the circular of the Government of India. Their orders in the present case are nothing more or less than a translation of the oath of teetotallers "to touch not, taste not, smell not" anything that intoxicates. The attitude to be maintained towards alcohol is not merely of neutrality, but of active opposition and contempt. To make the National Congress to a Government servant what alcohol is to the teetotaller is not only unjustifiable, but utterly unwise. Mr. Caine was perfectly right in saying with quiet irony that no orders would be issued in England, when the Congress met in London, forbidding officials or ministers of State from attending the Congress as visitors. A visitor does not commit himself any more than an outsider. He attends the Congress merely out of curiosity, and may or may not have any sympathy with the movement itself. If he is not permitted to attend the Congress as a visitor, he should not be allowed to attend as a guest the St. Andrew's dinner or any other political meeting.

9. The Gujaráti (84), in its issue of the 4th January, writes:—After three days' sitting the sixth Indian National Congress closed its deliberations on Tuesday last amidst great enthusiasm. In spite of the evil forebodings, the number of delegates was quite large and fully represented the different races and provinces of the country. There were zamindárs and bankers, merchants and pensioned officials, the ornaments of the bar and the representatives of the press, from the Bombay and the Madras Presidencies, as also from the distant Panjáb and Central Provinces. The proceedings were conducted in a most business-like manner, and must have very favourably impressed the two Members of Parliament who honoured the assembly with their presence, in regard to the capacities of Indian people for political discussions. One of them actually allowed himself to be elected as a delegate, and took part like other members of the body in the discussions and deliberations of the Congress. It is a pity the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal had to return the tickets which were sent to him, on the ground that the Government resolution forbade officials to be present at its meetings. We do not quite understand the motive which led to the laying down of such an arbitrary rule. We do not think those responsible for it were so simple-minded as to believe that the course adopted by them would have the effect of preventing the officials from sympathizing with the movement. Such conduct is not quite worthy of a liberal Government, and is not calculated to do any good whatever. On the contrary, it may cause unnecessary heart-burning, which it cannot be the interest of the authorities to create. At any rate, the leaders of the Congress did well this year in inviting Government representatives to come and see for themselves what the Congress was and how far its claims to be a representative body were founded in fact. It was a bold challenge, which we should have been glad to see accepted.

10. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 5th January, writes:—Just in the nick of time the Bengal Government issued a circular prohibiting its servants from attending the Indian National Congress even as visitors. The Congress Committee paid the Viceroy and the Lieutenant-Governor the graceful compliment of an invitation to the Congress. The invited guests returned the compliment by declining themselves to attend and prohibiting all servants of the Government from attending. We question the correctness of this construction of the Government order. We doubt if it is intended to prohibit absolutely the attendance of Government servants at public meetings even as visitors. When, as in the Congress, there are arrangements to mark off the visitors from those taking active part, there ought to be no objection. But Sir Charles Elliot apparently puts too wide a construction on the words of the order, as implying a prohibition in any case. We wonder why the Government should adopt such a suspicious attitude. The Congress is the best friend of the Government. It seeks to assist the Government to get a knowledge of its defects and shortcomings, and of the wishes of the people whom it governs. The Government ought therefore to take the Congress into its confidence instead of sullenly holding itself aloof from it. As regards the servants of Government, we know English practice is in support of the order made by the Government. But in a country like India, where the total educated body of the people is so small, to prohibit Government servants from taking any part in popular movements is to take a large slice out of that useful body. Such a prohibition will have its Nemesis on the Government itself. It will deprive the movements of the staid counsel and experience of Government officers, and will thereby impair the efficiency of those movements to give aid and advice to the Government. Further, the prohibition may deprive the Government of the services of some most eligible men who might fear to put their liberty in jeopardy, and might elect rather to remain independent and serve their country than have their mouths gagged and their movements clogged by the shackles of Government service. To our mind, the Government is pursuing a most short-sighted policy, and the sooner it rescinds its order about attendance at public meetings the better. The worst of such an order is that in the hands of unsympathetic and unscrupulous officers it is apt to be carried beyond its original intent. We have heard of secret circulars and private espionage terrorizing small Government officials. Even Government Pleaders are laid under the embargo, and some of the pleaders are weak enough to quietly acquiesce in it. At the previous Congress at Calcutta, Lord Dufferin did the delegates the honour of inviting them to a party at Government House. At Madras, too, there was a Government House party, and some high officers of Government were present at the Congress. Under Lord Lansdowne's régime Government are resolved upon following an austere policy of isolation and distrust. We do not think such a policy will add to their strength.

11. The Subodh Patrika (18), in its issue of the 4th January, writes :—The Bengal Government will find a hard nut to crack in the resolution which the Indian National Congress has passed, condemning that Government for its circular prohibiting all its officers from attending the Congress even as visitors or spectators. The Lieutenant-Governor, who is responsible for that circular, can only justify it on the ground that the Government of India has directed all public servants not to have anything to do with any political meetings. But that ground presents itself in the light of a sham pretext when it is remembered that European officers not only attend St. Andrew's dinners, but also feel themselves at liberty to make with impunity political speeches and either abuse or ridicule the Congress. The Congress has done well to expose this affair, which discredits Sir Charles Elliot's Government.

The proceedings at the fourth meeting of the Social Conference approved.

12. The Snehă Sindhu (128), in its issue of the 7th January, approves of the several resolutions passed at the last Social Conference held at Calcutta on 28th ultimo, saying that it is more desirable to advise people to make a reform in their social customs from within rather than from without, and that Government interference would wound the religious feelings of the people.—The Gujaráti (84), in its issue of the 4th January, approves of the resolutions, but adds that the delegates to this conference were not elected at all and did not therefore represent any caste or city, that excepting half a dozen the so-called delegates took no interest in the proceedings of the conference, that since the retirement of Rája Sir T. Mádhav Ráo the cause of social reform has much suffered, that the 10,000 persons who have joined the conference are a very small portion of the population of 20 krors, and that the movement is not likely to exist long.

The Hindu social reformers and their reforms.

13. The Poona Vaibhav (54), in its issue of the 4th January, has an article on the Hindu reformers and their proposed reforms, in which it says :—The customs and practices which the so-called reformers of the present day are desirous of introducing into the Hindu community, and the introduction of which is considered by many sensible men to be fraught with evil, were in ancient times widely in vogue among our people and were discontinued only by strenuous efforts and with much difficulty as they were found to produce very disastrous consequences. For instance, the habit of drinking intoxicating liquors which finds favour with the modern reformers was formerly indulged in very extensively in this country and was found to produce very pernicious effects on Hindu society by its demoralising and degenerating influences. It had therefore to be extirpated and our ancestors had to struggle very hard to do it. Thousands of years elapsed before the evil habit was completely uprooted and we were reformed. Though there is no other country in the world which is at the present day so free from intemperance as India, yet, strange to say, the so-called educated men are forcing upon us this evil habit of drinking which obtains in unrefined countries. Remarriage of women is another reform that is recommended. It was much practised in India in ancient times, but seeing that it lessened the importance of the husband, lowered his status in the family, made his life somewhat precarious, created discord in the household, discouraged chastity, and in a way embittered the pleasures of marital life, our ancestors put a stop to this practice also. Many other countries are trying their best to do away with it, but to no purpose, and yet our reformers are exerting themselves to revive it in India. This is very much to be deplored. The third reform is that of divorce, which was in fashion in olden times, but was found productive of much misery and heart-burning. It led men and women to lead an impure life, and had therefore to be done away with. There are many other evil practices which the so-called reformers are trying to introduce into our community under the misnomer of reform, and these we will treat of in a future issue.

A libel against the Hindu community and a suggestion to the Hindus in the matter.

14. The Bakul (23), in its issue of the 4th January, refers to the remarks made by Mr. L. R. Ashburner, formerly of the Bombay Civil Service, on the moral character of Hindu widows, in an article on Hindu marriage laws contributed by him to the National Review, and observes:—We do not say that all our women are perfectly pure, but it has been admitted even by Christian missionary bodies that very few nations match the Hindus in their morality. We ourselves are advocates of legislative interference in social matters, yet neither we nor any orthodox Hindus would like an exaggerated account of any good or evil practice existing in our society. The duty of defending Hindu women from attacks on their character rests on Hindu men, and the latter should without hesitation complain to Government against the silly aspersions cast by Mr. Ashburner on their women. If it be found difficult to take action against him in England, we implore our people to try to get his pension discontinued, which he receives out of the revenues collected from the hard-working people whom he has libelled, until he performs proper penance for the offence he has given.

An exhortation to the people of India not to sign the memorial for the abolition of opium trade with China.

15. The Bombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 9th January, exhorts the people of India to desist from signing a memorial prepared by certain parties in England who condemn the opium trade with China as immoral, praying Government to discontinue poppy cultivation in India, stating that the abolition of the opium trade would confer no benefit on the people of China while India would be obliged to impose on herself a new tax to make up the present opium revenue, when her inability to submit herself to fresh taxation is an admitted fact.

Last garden party at Government House, Parel, and the number of Natives invited to it.

16. The Akhbáre Sodágar (93), in its issue of the 10th January, regrets that only four Native gentlemen should have been invited to the second garden party given by His Excellency the Governor and Lady Harris at Government House, Parel, on the afternoon of the 8th instant, observing that under the administration of Lord Reay the leaders of the different Native communities were invited to such parties and some of the Native ladies were also favoured with an invitation, and that the same rule should have been followed on the last occasion, which was, however, distinguished by the total absence of Native ladies.

His Excellency Lord Harris's gift of Rs. 200 for distribution amongst the poor people of Surat.

17. A correspondent of the Kaiser-i-Hind (87), in its issue of the 4th January, says that Mr. Lely, Collector and Agent to His Excellency the Governor at Surat, has applied the sum of Rs. 200 presented by His Excellency Lord Harris during his recent visit to that city for distribution amongst the poor, to providing a band that plays once a week in the public park, but that this use of his gift would not be liked by His Excellency, and recommends that as the people do not seem to appreciate the band it would be much better to distribute the sum among poor and destitute persons of the city or use it for other charitable objects.

A complaint regarding appointments in the Revenue Department, Ahmednagar.

18. In an article, headed, "Anarchy in the local Revenue Department or supersession of claims," the Jagadádarsh (37), in its issue of the 4th January, writes:—At last our prediction about the appointment of Mr. Ganesh Váman Bhingárkar as head clerk in supersession of the claims of Mr. Krishnáji Vásudev Joshi has been fulfilled. Mr. Bhingárkar belongs to the Registration Department and has very little knowledge of English, while Mr. Joshi, whose claims have been disregarded, has passed the Matriculation and the Lower and Higher Standard Examinations with credit and belongs to the department in which the vacancy occurred. We do not know why the Collector of Ahmednagar imports people from other departments and the Commissioner sanctions their appointments. According to a Government resolution Mr. Joshi's claims are to be considered equal to those of a graduate in the department, and Government should have some respect for their resolution. We intend to change the direction of our complaints. Instead of further commenting on the injustice already done, we shall, with the help of a sure and certain astronomical book, first predict the injustice likely to be done in making another appointment. We accordingly say that Mr. Vináyak Govind Karandikar, an employé in the Revenue Department, will be appointed Sub-Registrar in place of Mr. G. V. Deshmukh in supersession of the claims of several persons in the Registration Department.

Purchase of young female children of poor parents by prostitutes for bringing them up to lead an immoral life.

19. A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (95) of the 5th January, writing from Cochin, says that young female children of poor parents are purchased by prostitutes for the purpose of bringing them up to lead an immoral life like themselves after they are grown up, and when these purchasers are questioned about the object of the purchase they say that the children have been received simply through a charitable object. It would be well were Government to enquire into these questionable transactions and suppress the evil.

A complaint against the police of táluka Mátar, Kaira District.

20. The Snehí Sindhu (128), in its issue of the 2nd January, complains of frequent robberies being committed near the village of Hariála in the Mátar Táluka of the Kaira District, and says that several of these offences have been purposely omitted to be registered by the police, while sometimes the sufferers hesitate to lodge complaints lest the police may get offended. The Sindhu observes that on Saturday before the last, several merchants who were going to Wadol were robbed at Hariála, regrets that though the Collector's and the Police Superintendent's camps were in close vicinity, Mr. Lakshmansing, the Chief Constable at Mátar, omitted to make an inquiry into the matter, and requests the Superintendent of Police to bring the offenders to book.

Part II.—Legislation.

Comments on the Bill for raising the age of consent.

21. In alluding to the report that the Honourable Sir Andrew Scoble will, at the next meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council, introduce a Bill raising the age of consent, the Bombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 9th

January, says:—Those people of the Hindu community who object to the passing of an enactment on the subject, not on a religious ground which is discarded by the leaders of that community, but on the plea that it would be better to bring round the ignorant portion of the community by explaining to them the actual benefits than to compel them by a legal enactment, ought to hasten to hold public meetings of their respective castes and to decide upon raising the age of consent, resolving to inflict social punishment on those who would go against this decision. If this is done before the passing of the Bill, it is likely that Government may withdraw the Bill, leaving the community to enforce the salutary resolution. [The Jáme Jamshed (109) and the Akhbáre Sodágar (93), in their respective issues of the same date, express approval of Sir Andrew Scoble's Bill for raising the age of consent from ten to twelve and making the case of husbands with child-wives a non-cognizable offence.]

Part III.—Education.

Suggestions in connection with the nomination of new Fellows of the Bombay University.

22. The Surya Prakásh (90), in its issue of the 3rd January, writes:—Though our contemporaries in Gujarát have with one voice raised an outcry for several years past for the nomination of deserving gentlemen in that province as Fellows of the Bombay University, no heed has been paid to their complaint either by the Chancellor or by the Vice-Chancellor of the University. There are many gentlemen in that province deserving of this honour who would take a disinterested, keen and active part in the advancement of education; but it is to be regretted that Gujarát is very meagrely represented in the Senate of the University. His Excellency the Governor, the Chancellor of the University, had, during his short period of administration, occasion to visit all the cities of Gujarát, and we have reason to believe that during His Lordship's sojourn in those parts he came in contact with persons whom His Excellency may well nominate as Fellows.

Appointment of Professors in Indian Arts colleges.

23. The Jáme Jamshed (109), in its issue of the 6th January, says:—The professorial staff of Government Arts colleges is not now-a-days recruited with that care and caution which was taken in this matter in former days. Formerly experts in particular subjects were brought out from England to serve as Professors of their special studies in the Indian colleges, and the result of this system was that students taught by them received sound education. Now-a-days a college Professor is appointed to a chair without consideration as to his suitability for it, and is made to occupy different chairs by succession for alleged exigencies of the department, and the result is that students are not well instructed. It is therefore to be hoped that this censurable course will be given up and that able English graduates who have made special studies of particular subjects will be brought out from England to serve as Professors of their respective specialities, that they will never be transferred to the posts of Educational Inspectors and will be allowed to remain as Professors, due arrangements being made for their promotion according to the length of service. Unless this is done, Indian colleges will not improve and become model institutions.

Part IV.—Railways.

A complaint against the G. I. P. Railway authorities.

24. A correspondent of the Gujaráti (84), in its issue of the 4th January, writes:—The mail train that started for Calcutta from Bombay at 10 P.M. on Monday, the 22nd December, was filled to its utmost capacity with National Congress delegates from the Bombay Presidency, and the North-West Provinces and other passengers. It is a pity that even when some persons had got their names registered and seats had been reserved for them they were put to serious inconvenience by their reserved compartments having been previously occupied by Europeans, who, when asked to vacate them by the guard in charge of the train and the station master at the Victoria Terminus, defied their authority and chuckled over their triumph in having successfully prevented Natives from obtaining what was their due. It is a still greater pity that after an express some of the Native ladies were also favoured with an invitation, and that the same rule should have been followed on the last occasion, which was, however, distinguished by the total absence of Native ladies.

His Excellency Lord Harris's gift of Rs. 200 for distribution amongst the poor people of Surat.

17. Part IV.—Railways.

A complaint against the G. I. P. Railway authorities.

24. A correspondent of the Gujaráti (84), in its issue of the 4th January, writes:—The mail train that started for Calcutta from Bombay at 10 P.M. on Monday, the 22nd December, was filled to its utmost capacity with National Congress delegates from the Bombay Presidency, and the North-West Provinces and other passengers. It is a pity that even when some persons had got their names registered and seats had been reserved for them they were put to serious inconvenience by their reserved compartments having been previously occupied by Europeans, who, when asked to vacate them by the guard in charge of the train and the station master at the Victoria Terminus, defied their authority and chuckled over their triumph in having successfully prevented Natives from obtaining what was their due. It is a still greater pity that after an express promise was given by the guard that the aggrieved parties would be provided with accommodation at Kalyán it was shamelessly broken, and they were compelled to shift for themselves without being allowed room for sitting with comfort. The Europeans stretched themselves at their whole length and had the rare impudence to ask the insulted gentlemen whether they had not yet been accommodated by the Railway Company. Those who were thus treated with the connivance of the responsible railway officials are respectable persons, and I have strong grounds to believe that the matter will not be allowed to be quietly dropped. I have no doubt that if the aggrieved parties had been Europeans and the offenders Natives, the latter would have been dragged out of the carriage by the officers of the Railway Company. The railway authorities knew from Monday morning that the pressure on their carriage accommodation was very great, and it was scandalous that accommodation should have been insufficient, to the great inconvenience and annoyance of all classes of passengers.

PART V.—Municipalities.

Condemnation of the doubling of the town duty on grain by the Municipal Corporation of Bombay.

25. The Bombay Samáchár (95) and the Jáme Jamshed (109), in their respective issues of the 10th January, severely condemn the decision of the Municipal Corporation of Bombay by a majority of thirty-three to twenty-two, to raise the duty on grain from two to four annas per candy as a heavy burden on the poor people, and exhort the rate-payers as well as the public of Bombay to express their opinion on the subject at a public meeting held for the purpose.

PART VI.—Native States.

Government reply to the memorial from the public meeting of the sympathizers with the Cambay sufferers disapproved.

26. The Bombay Samáchár (95) and the Jáme Jamshed (109), in their issues of the 7th and 9th January, consider the reply of the Bombay Government to the memorial from the committee for the relief of the Cambay sufferers on the subject of misgovernment in Cambay to be not satisfactory, and approve of the said committee's resolution to take further steps in the matter.

A suggestion to Government regarding the Political Agent's Department, Káthiáwár.

27. The Rájyabhakta (121), in its issue of the 6th January, recommends Government either to abolish the Political Agency in Káthiáwár, placing the province under the direct control of the High Court and the Political Department of the Secretariat at Bombay, or to restrict the powers of the Political Agent and his Assistants. The Assistants, adds the paper, should be transferred every five years. Several important reforms, such as the appointment of a Civilian as Political Agent and the transfer of several Assistants, were carried out during the régime of Lord Reay, and if Mr. Lely had remained for a longer period as Acting Political Agent the expenses of the department would have been curtailed and much benefit would have accrued. It was not necessary to create the post of the Pránt Officer and to incur thereby additional expense, and it is to be hoped that this office will be a temporary one.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Alleged prediction by some Bráhmans about the cessation of British rule in India at the close of the 19th century.

1. The Bombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 12th January, contains a paragraph stating :—It is said that several Pandits and Bráhmans have predicted that the British rule in India will cease with the close of the 19th century and that the government of the country will pass into the hands of the Hindus. These simpletons also say that since the Indian Empire is destined to go into the hands of the Hindus, they need not act in harmony with the Mahomedans.

The Indian National Congress and the circular issued by the Bengal Government prohibiting its servants from attending its meetings.

2. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 11th January, writes :—The Government of Sir Charles Elliot has certainly taken a very injudicious step in issuing a circular prohibiting the public servants in Calcutta and its suburbs from attending the Indian National Congress even as visitors. Whatever may be the motives of the Government of India in issuing their circular, we are not inclined to go deep into the question, but it is certainly much to be regretted that the Bengal Government should have interpreted the circular of the Supreme Government in a way uncharitable and discouraging to the great Indian cause. The circular of the Bengal Government and the letter of His Honor's Private Secretary to the Secretary of the Reception Committee of the Congress are indeed epoch-making documents, inasmuch as they unmistakably tell the people at large in what attitude the Anglo-Indian officials in general stand towards this movement of the Indian people, and what help and encouragement can be expected from them in the honest endeavours of the people to assist the Government in making the British rule in India more beneficial to the people and more lasting by securing for them a sufficiently wide scope for the full realization of the legitimate aspirations which the rulers have produced in the people of India by bringing them in touch with Western civilization. The last Congress has done well in authorizing its President to submit a petition to the Most Honourable the Marquis of Lansdowne. We fervently hope that His Lordship will not fail to give due consideration to what the people say. We should, however, be pardoned if we observe that it is not likely that the National Congress will at this stage of affairs and under the existing circumstances receive any sympathy from the bureaucratic element. This very fact is not without its advantages to the people, for they will then learn to be always cautious and moderate in their demands and will cling fast to their own views and try for success.

Memorial of the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha regarding the reduction of salt-duty supported.

3. The Native Opinion (16), in its issue of the 11th January, writes :—The Poona Sárvajanik Sabha has done well in forwarding a memorial to the Government of India, pressing upon it the advisability of doing away with the enhancement in the duty on salt. It is quite timely ; for this is the time for the preparation of the annual Budget. With the improvement in exchange, the general prosperous condition of the other less objectionable sources of revenue, and the decrease in the expenditure on Burmah, there is absolutely no excuse for the retention of the increased rate. We hope the Finance Minister will have the courage to give the much-needed relief. The question of the income-tax also requires consideration. While not recommending its abolition, as it is the only way of touching the pockets of our highly paid officers, rich merchants and professional men, it seems advisable that the minimum of taxable income should be raised to Rs. 1,000. If this is done and the salt-duty reduced, the Government will earn the gratitude of the country without inflicting a serious loss on the treasury. Had the finances been still in the position in which they were a couple of years ago, the people would not have asked for this remission. The return of prosperous condition emboldens them to do so, and we hope their prayers will not be rejected.

4. The Bombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 12th, and the Jáme Jamshed (109), in that of the 13th January, express complete approval of the above-mentioned memorial praying for a reduction in the duty on salt from

Rs. 2-8-0 to Rs. 2 a maund, observe that the arguments set forth in the memorial in support of the prayer are sound and incontrovertible, and express a hope that the reduction prayed for will be made at the time of making the Budget arrangements for the next year.

Alleged mixture of bones of animals with foreign salt.

5. The Bhárat Bhráta (144), in its issue of the 6th January, says :—The Pandits of Nuddea having discovered bones of cows, bullocks and other animals in the salt coming from other countries, consider it improper to use this salt. But how can the use of this condiment be foregone when there is a prohibition to manufacture it at home? For this very reason the Hindu law-givers have prohibited the use of foreign eatables. If one looks about him he finds in almost all foreign provisions some objectionable substance or other, the use of which is prohibited to Hindus as well as Mahomedans. There seems, however, no way of escaping this contamination, and it is but meet that all articles of consumption should be used after repeating the name of God.

Alleged high-handed and illegal action of Mr. Kelkar, Subordinate Judge at Saundatti, Belgaum District.

6. The Belgaum Samáchár (24), in its issue of the 12th January, refers to the recent acquittal by the Sessions Court at Belgaum of two persons, one of whom was charged with forgery and the other with abetment of same offence, and requests the Bombay High Court to take notice of the conduct of Mr. Kelkar, Subordinate Judge of Saundatti, who, in a case before him, suspected the two accused of having committed the offence and kept them in the custody of his Názir for several days instead of sending them at once, as he had power to do, to take their trial before a Magistrate, and thus himself exercised for a short time the powers of a Magistrate. It would be dangerous, observes the paper, for any person to go to a Civil Court if magisterial proceedings were to be carried on there in such a high-handed manner.

Comments on the verdict of a jury in a dacoity case recently tried in the Thána Sessions Court.

7. While writing about a case of dacoity committed at Ojivade, recently tried before the Sessions Judge, Thána, the Din Bandhu (10), in its issue of the 11th January, observes :—Eight of the accused in this case were sentenced each to seven years' imprisonment, four to five years' and five to three years' each. The evidence in the case plainly showed that there were only nine or ten persons who committed the dacoity. Seeing that several of the accused were sentenced though there was no valid evidence against them, many persons are surprised with the verdict of the jury. We are certain that if the High Court looked into the papers of the case, several innocent persons involved in it would get justice. But the difficulty is about the High Court looking over the papers. From the action of the jury it appeared that if the jury had consisted entirely of Bráhman jurors they would not have failed to convict all the accused indiscriminately. The Sessions Judge summed up and explained the case to the jury excellently, and if the latter had given its verdict in the light of the Judge's explanation very few of the accused would have been convicted; but unfortunately for the accused it did not do so.

Approval of the appointment of Mr. Hormasji Dádábhái as Fourth Judge of the Small Causes Court, Bombay.

8. The same newspaper says :—We congratulate Mr. Hormasji Dádábhái on his appointment as the Fourth Judge of the Bombay Small Causes Court, a post which he very much liked and which should have been bestowed upon him long ago. As to his fitness for the post there can be no question. We consider this appointment to be the best that could have been made; but we understand that he has been appointed sub. pro-tem. We hope the question of his age will not come in his way and disqualify him for the post which he has temporarily filled so often.

Complaint about Native military officers not being pensioned off on completion of 32 years' service.

9. The Pandit (155), in its issue of the 12th December, states :—Though there is a regulation and an order has been promulgated in the Bombay Presidency that a Native military officer should be pensioned off on the completion of 32 years' service, no attention is paid to them either by the commanding officers of Native regiments or at the Army Head-quarters. There can be no objection to an extension of service being sanctioned in the case of an officer who has completed his service and has a claim to the honour of the Order of British India; but no extension ought to be granted without such special reason, as the claims of the officer next below him are prejudiced thereby. In some cases there exists spite between these two officers, and the former, with a view to satisfy it, gains the favour of the commanding officer, obtaining for himself an extension of service and inflicting pecuniary loss on the latter. It is to be hoped that this complaint will receive due attention from His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief.

A request to Government in connection with glandered horses.

10. In alluding to the case of glandered horses that was recently decided by the Second Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, the Jáme Jamshed (109), in its issue of the 13th January, states that ignorance as to the contagious and dangerous character of this malady widely prevails among Native dealers and owners of horses, and that for the safety of men and horses it is desirable that a notification in the different vernaculars describing the real character of the malady and the law about it should be issued by Government for the information of the public.

Part II.—Legislation.

Remarks on the Age of Consent Bill and the speeches made at its first reading in the Viceregal Legislative Council.

11. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 12th January, writes:—The age of 'consent question is coming to a head. The agitation of the last two years is showing its first fruit. The Government of India has introduced into the Supreme Legislative Council its long expected Bill to amend Section 375 of the Indian Penal Code. The amendment proposed is very well guarded, and ought to silence all opposition. It is intended to extend the benefit of the present law up to twelve years in the cases of both married and unmarried girls, but in the case of married girls the offence by the husband will be non-cognizable. This safeguard ought to remove all fear of police interference. In fact, we have never considered the fears real, but all ground for them will be removed now that the law expressly proposes to make direct police intervention impossible. The Honourable Mr. Scoble is careful to point out that the proposed law creates no new offence. What the act is intended to provide against is already an offence under one or other of the sections of the Indian Penal Code. Further, the law will affect all communities. It has a twofold object, viz., to protect girls from "immature prostitution and from premature cohabitation." As to the first, we may take it, not a word of opposition will be raised anywhere. It is only the second that will excite the ire of a certain section of the Hindu community. Both the Honourable Mr. Scoble and His Excellency the Viceroy put the case for the law very strongly. The proposal is made under express instructions from the Secretary of State, and is the result of a conviction induced not only by the agitation of the Indian press and Indian memorials, but by the intercession of influential ladies and gentlemen in England. Brought forth under such auspices there is every chance that the Bill will become law in a few weeks. Opposition there will be, and Government cannot but be prepared for it. All the machinery of public agitation will be set in motion. Government will be overwhelmed with telegrams, memorials, and perhaps deputations. But let the Government be firm in its righteous resolve. There was no lack of opposition when the Government carried the Remarriage Act of 1856. The present agitation is still more factitious and ignorant. There is in this case not even the semblance of a cause for all the righteous indignation that will be spent upon it. As the Honourable Mr. Scoble has truly pointed out, the Hindu Shástras themselves prohibit cohabitation with severe penalties. There is only a stupid custom, or rather practice prevailing in certain parts, which has no title to be respected, that the law will interfere with. There is no interference with Hindu religion rightly so-called, and as to social customs, Government need not be particular about respecting them when they are distinctly inhuman or hurtful. The present measure is such as the Government is fully justified in enacting. What its merits will be in its practical operation we cannot say at this stage. We believe that it will do some good. In any case, it will be thoroughly harmless.

However insignificant an amount of good it may do, we would desire the Bill to pass, if for nothing else, at least as a protest against the prevailing ignorant superstition about State interference. The Bill is valuable now, in our view, more as representing a principle than for its intrinsic merits. It represents the cause of reform. Its rejection or withdrawal will mean the triumph of the party of anti-reform, and will throw back the cause of reform at least for a decade. We earnestly trust, therefore, that the Bill introduced into the Council last Friday will pass into law.

12. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 11th January, writes :— Sir Andrew Scoble appears to have done his utmost to disarm criticism, and His Excellency Lord Lansdowne to have done something more. Mr. Nulkar, the eminent Marátha Bráhman member, seems to have stood up for the Bill manfully. The only opponent in Council up to this time appears to be Sir Romesh Chunder Mitter, the Bengal member. He has been largely anticipated by Sir Andrew, and answered both by Mr. Nulkar and His Excellency the Viceroy. It is hardly worth while examining Sir R. Mitter's objections in these columns; they have been fully met so often and in so many places. The one answer that would meet all legitimate objections is that if no abuse of the law has arisen from Government having voluntarily fixed the limit of age at ten, there ought to be less than none of the abuse apprehended when the limit is raised to twelve. Besides, it may now be seen that in one important respect the law is going to be made more lenient than before. The amendment concerns both Europeans and Natives, as the honourable mover of the Bill explained on Friday. It has been fully approved of by the European press, who, in fact, have declared for a higher limit. The Native press, as a whole, including orthodox writers, has accepted the measure. Let us now see what reception it has in its present more acceptable form. It may be repeated that the Government of India have tried to make it universally acceptable in India. We have nothing to say against this course. We do not want a vindictive law, however anxious we may be that it should vindicate the rights and liberties of the subjects.

13. The Gujarát Darpan (83), in its issue of the 15th January, writes :— The interpretations of a certain commentator, who is an authority in Bengal, gave Sir Romesh Mitter grounds for protesting against the Bill. But with all his learning he could make out a very feeble case for his clients. The failure of such a great man as Sir Romesh to establish a case is justification enough for the Bill. About discontent and all that sort of things which Sir Mitter put forward to scare the Government, he may be right to a small extent as far as Bengal is concerned; but as regards the other provinces of the Empire, the Bill will meet with no great opposition there. For Gujarát we can affirm with certainty that consummation after the age of twelve is the rule and under that age the exception. No people in their senses, therefore, can take any objection to a measure which gives an authoritative sanction to a custom already prevailing. It was therefore with calm judiciousness that the Honourable Mr. Nulkar, who represents Bombay in the Viceregal Council, spoke in support of the Bill. The indiscretion which the reformers have displayed in mixing up the age of consent proposal with others which would bring about a violent change in the marriage relations of the Hindu community was dwelt upon at length by the honourable gentleman. His reproof to the reformers was well deserved. He was also right in attributing much of the opposition which will be encountered from the anti-reform party to causes which their opponents in the course of angry discussions have given. It always happens in an excited state of the popular feeling that judgment is subordinated to conflicting passions and emotions. So has it happened in this case. We ourselves have ere now shown to the reformers this mistake of theirs. Mr. Nulkar's remarks about the authority of the Shástras will be endorsed by all right-minded persons.

Disapproval of the agitation raised by orthodox people against the Honourable Mr. Scoble's Bill for raising the age of consent.

14. The Sudhárak (19), in its issue of the 12th January, challenges those who assert that the Bill brought before the Supreme Legislative Council by the Honourable Mr. Scoble to raise the age of consent is a violation by Government of the promise of religious neutrality given by them in 1858, to point out the injunctions of the Hindu scriptures which direct the consummation of marriage when the girl attains puberty, no matter what her age is and in what circumstances she is situated, and to state instances of persons having had to suffer penalty for infringement of this injunction; says that those who raise an outcry against the Bill and excite the public mind against Government in the name of religion deserve to be called anti-religious and disaffection-mongers; and asks those who require that the reform proposed by the Bill should be postponed till public opinion is sufficiently educated and brought round to support the reform, if the Hindu kings and law-givers attached so much importance to public opinion as they claim for it at the present time.

15. The Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 15th January, in its Maráthi columns, also considers the agitation against the Bill to be ill-advised and inconsiderate, and says that if it is incumbent on Government to make a criminal law for the protection of their subjects of all castes and creeds it is idle to expect them to make it so as not to contravene the religious injunctions of some of them, and that if under the Hindu scriptures a woman cannot give her consent before the age of puberty it is no interference with those scriptures if Government, for the convenience of people of all religious faiths, fix the age of consent at an earlier period.

16. The Bombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 14th January, approves of the sentiments expressed by the Honourable Ráo Bahádur Nulkar and in a recent issue of the Indian Mirror in favour of the Honourable Mr. Scoble's Bill for raising the age of consent as more in unison with Hindu religious jurisprudence, and exhorts the Hindus to hold public meetings at an early date in order to elicit sound public opinion on the subject, which, it believes, must show itself in favour of the Honourable Mr. Scoble's proposal and must strengthen the hands of Government to pass the measure.

17. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 12th January, says:— Under the existing law, authority is held by the police to arrest without a warrant and place before a Magistrate a person who is reported to have cohabited with his child-wife under the age of ten years, but there has not been a single case in which this authority has been exercised. Notwithstanding this, on the question of raising the age of consent coming forward, a fear was expressed by the party opposing the measure that the Bill would lead to an invasion of the privacy of families by the police. It is gratifying that this fear has been effectually removed by inserting a provision in the Bill by which offences by a man against his wife are declared to be non-cognizable. The course taken by the Supreme Government in regard to suits for restitution of conjugal rights cannot, however, be approved. The public have been demanding for some time past that the coercive form of the law, under which a decree for the restitution of conjugal rights may be enforced by imprisonment, should be amended. But Government intend to give option to a Civil Court to refuse to consign a recusant wife or husband to imprisonment. Such a provision would, however, replace the present fixed law by an uncertainty that would leave the Judges free to act according to their whims and would only create a difference of opinion on the subject among the people. It is incomprehensible that Government should come forward with a bold front to legislate upon a subject on which there exists a difference of opinion among the Hindus and in spite of the opposition raised by the orthodox party, while it should hold back from a question that has no difference of opinion about it among the same community and when it has been declared at four successive social conference meetings as well as by the orthodox party that the question of imprisonment for refusal to restore conjugal rights has no connection whatever with their religion and that they would not be sorry for the abolition of the punishment. It is therefore to be hoped that the provision in the Bill for making imprisonment optional will be removed.

18. The Jáme Jamshed (109), in its issue of the same date, observes:— The time selected by the Government of India for bringing forward the Bill for raising the age of consent is inopportune. After the voice raised in England demanding social reformation among the Hindus has reached India the Bill has been put forward, and this has very naturally created an alarm in Hindu minds that, should this Bill be passed, it would be soon followed by new legal enactments interfering with their social customs in conformity with suggestions received from England and hurting their religious feelings. Reports have been already received that public meetings for condemning the Bill are to be held in different parts of the country; and should this occur, there would be a likelihood of the measure being shoved aside for the present. There is no doubt that it is desirable that the age of consent should be raised, and under other circumstances than those mentioned above the Bill would not have elicited from the Hindus the opposition it is likely to meet with now.

19. The Hitechchhu (86) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 15th January, approves of the Bill for raising the age of consent, observing that it does not interfere with the religious rites of the Hindus and is only a reform in the existing law. The Hitechchhu recommends that the age of consent be raised to 16 years in the case of females and to 20 in that of males, and that the provision for imprisonment in cases of restitution of conjugal rights be rescinded.—The Broach Samáchár (97), in its issue of the same date, observes:—Numerous protests have been made by the Hindus against Government interference in their social and religious matters, but the introduction of the present Bill proves that Government have turned a deaf ear to them as well as to the advice of leaders of society like Rája Sir T. Mádhav Ráo and others. It now behoves Hindus not to protest against the Bill, but to suggest such changes as would make the law suitable to them.

20. The Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 15th January, writes:—Now that we have before us the full text of the debate in the Council Chamber at Calcutta, we find that the proposed amendment is based on lines altogether different from those which commended themselves to the late Sir M. Melvill when he in May 1886 prepared a draft Bill to give effect to Mr. Malabari's views in the event of their proving acceptable to the Government of India. We are inclined to think that if an amendment had been based upon the lines sketched out by Sir M. Melvill, with some modifications, the object which the Legislature should in such matters keep in view would have been better attained. Perhaps it may not yet be too late to do so, and in this belief we commend Sir M. Melvill's scheme to the careful consideration of the Government of India and to that of the Supreme Legislative Council. If the proposed amendment were to become the law of the land, a person having sexual intercourse with his wife who was under ten would be placed in the same class with one who had consummated his marriage, the wife being between ten and twelve, in pursuance of certain religious commandment; but, as clearly pointed out by Sir M. Melvill, there ought certainly to be a differentiating treatment between the two cases. To make the former offence a non-cognizable one with the latter would be, in our humble opinion, a serious mistake. We are, of course, aware that since 1860, when the Penal Code was enacted, no case of rape by a husband against his wife, she being under ten, has occurred, but it may be doubted whether such a consideration affords a sufficient ground for dispensing with a provision already existing in the criminal law of the country and to which no objection has been taken. The foregoing are briefly the reasons why we should prefer that the existing provision in Section 375 should have been allowed to remain intact. Now, looking to the proposed amendment as it stands, we find that it is expected to put a stop to the evil which is principally confined to the Bengal Presidency. The Honourable Sir A. Scoble, in his speech in support of the motion for leave to introduce the Bill, said that its object was twofold, viz., to protect female children (1) from immature prostitution and (2) from premature cohabitation. It is gratifying to find that, as far as the evil of immature prostitution is concerned, the proposed amendment has not called forth any opposition. As regards the other aspect of the evil, viz., premature cohabitation, or what the Legislature proposes to regard as premature consummation of marriage, it seems that considerable opposition may be expected from the Bengal Presidency. The grounds of this opposition are clearly set forth in the Honourable Sir R. Mitter's speech, and looking to the high and eminent position of this illustrious spokesman of the opposition, we think it is necessary to dismiss from our minds the idea that the opposition is a captious one.

21. The Din Bandhu (10), in its issue of the 11th January, writes:—We cannot look upon the Age of Consent Bill of the Government of India either as a triumph of the reform party or as a defeat of their opponents. As a protective measure, it does not afford more protection than the present laws on the subject. The legislators are quite right in not giving the police summary powers of arrest under the Bill, but, as it is, its provisions will remain as a dead letter, because, knowing as we do the feelings and sentiments of Natives in social matters, at least amongst respectable classes no one will come forward to act as a public censor and to perform the somewhat unpleasant duty of prosecuting boy-husbands. It would have been much better if marriages had been stopped under a certain fixed age, because then the humane object of protecting child-wives would have been fully achieved. We are quite aware of the difficulty the Government have to face in legislating in a matter like this, but since they have made up their mind to insert the thin end of the wedge, they could have gone a little further and laid the axe at the very root of the tree with a view to eradicate the evil.

22. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 11th January, writes:—We see from the Bill that the protests from the monster meetings of the large masses of orthodox Hindus have failed to convince the Government that the proposed Bill implies direct Government interference with a religious custom. We know that Government are actuated in this case by the best of motives, but we submit that the proposed legislation would, as we have several times pointed out, be useless and ineffectual. Apart from the inevitable annoyance and difficulties in the working of the law that must follow from passing the proposed amendment, we once more point out that according to the religious injunctions of the Hindu Shástras the consummation ceremony must take place shortly after puberty, any departures in the present customs being treated as exceptions. If, therefore, a child-wife's age happens to be under twelve at puberty and the orthodox guardians observe their religious rite faithfully, the completion of the ceremony will be deemed a punishable offence by virtue of the amended section. Such cases are, no doubt, rare, but they go to prove State interference in religion. This is the view of each and every one of the people who have signed the protests already forwaded to the Indian Government. Rája Sir T. Mádhav Ráo has pointed out but too clearly the consequences that would follow in the train of the proposed amendment. We feel sure that legislative interference in this matter will be useless, and in certain cases, we submit, it will be mischievous to an appalling extent. But what appears to us most surprising is that Government has felt inclined to uphold the consideration of the Bill, waiving off but too lightly the objection raised by the orthodox community on the ground of Her Majesty's Proclamation of 1858. We fully admit that protection ought to be extended to each and every one, male or female, young or old, of Her Majesty's subjects. But in a case where the voice of the greatest majority of the people deems a religious custom inviolable, any interference on the part of Government will naturally be looked upon with dismal suspicion and inspire fears of even further interference in the minds of the subject people. We are glad to see that the Honourable Mr. Nulkar has made similar observations in his speeches. Sir Romesh Chunder Mitter is even more positive in his statement, and has made a perfectly plain and unreserved representation of the real facts. No man learned in the Hindu Shástras will hesitate to assert with Sir Romesh that "the proposed Bill would undoubtedly be an interference with the religious rites and duties of orthodox Hindus." So long as public opinion is not sufficiently educated, the people would be obstinate in maintaining the punctilious observances of their religious rites and customs. So long, therefore, it is strictly undesirable that Government should go against the sentiments of their subjects by introducing the Bill for consideration. We feel very happy to see that both our Native representatives in the Viceregal Council have, with fearless conscientiousness, represented the true state of public feeling.

23. The Native Opinion (16), in its issue of the 15th January, writes:—It is indeed a matter of very great regret that the Government of India should have thought it politic to introduce the Age of Consent Bill into the Viceregal Legislative Council at the instance of persons whose leadership the country has renounced in no uncertain sounds, and in defiance of emphatic protests from several quarters. In writing in this tone our intention is not to frighten the Government, but to persuade it of the unwisdom of its step. Hitherto we have made no secret of our firm conviction that legislation is the worst of all means of introducting social reforms in this country, the soundest policy being to trust to the ameliorating influences of time and education. We maintain that reforms, to be of any lasting benefit, must come from within and not forced from outside. Moreover, we are living under an alien Government, and consequently any attempt on the part of such a Government to deal in any manner with the time-honoured religious rites and customs of the people, albeit with the most philanthropic and beneficent intentions, is sure to be misunderstood by the masses and looked upon as a mischievous interference. Looked at in this light, there cannot be two opinions that Government has been beguiled by persons not in touch with the masses into following a policy not calculated to do any good. It is indeed a matter of dismay that the Government should have abandoned the prudent policy of non-intervention in obedience to the Queen's Proclamation of 1858, which the people rightly regard as their Magna Charta. There are surely grounds to regard this Bill with apprehension, and though Government may desire to soften its effects, it cannot fail to interfere with the religious customs of the Hindus. Government has, no doubt, made the offence a non-cognizable one with a view to leave no scope for police oppression and blackmailing. For this wise provision it is entitled to credit; and that we give without hesitation. But the main provision is sure to clash with Hindu marriage customs. According to the Shástras the Garbhádhána or consummation ceremony is required to be performed when the married girl attains puberty. Then supposing that a certain girl attains puberty before she completes her twelfth year, how is the above ceremony to be performed without infringing the enactment and coming within its penal clauses? As experience shows, many girls attain maturity before they complete their twelfth year. This is owing to climatic influences and is pointed out even by medical authorities like Drs. Carpenter and Lyon. If Government is determined to pass the measure in defiance of the wishes of the people, articulated in such an able manner by no less an authority than Sir Romesh Chandra Mitter—a person peculiarly qualified to interprete the Shástras of the Hindus and to speak on their behalf, after his unrivalled experience of fifteen years as a Judge and Chief Justice on the Bench of the Calcutta High Court,—it should at least see its way to amend the Bill in the light we have thrown on it.

24. The Satyavakta (124), in its issue of the 16th January, observes:—It is very surprising to see a change in the policy of our rulers, who a little while ago collected the opinions of several leading gentlemen and decided not to interfere in the religious rites and social customs of the Hindus. The introduction of the Bill has created much discontent among the people, and will probably lead them to think that Government will hereafter interfere with their other social customs, and will strengthen the wrong notion of the illiterate people that Government intend to make all Hindus and Mahomedans converts to Christianity. In very rare cases girls below the age of twelve years cohabit with their husbands and the proposed change is unnecessary. We therefore recommend people to protest against the Bill.

25. The Rájyabhakta (121), in its issue of the 13th January, observes:—The prayer of the Indian National Congress for the introduction of the elective principle in the Legislative Councils is very reasonable, and its object in making this request is to prevent Government from passing unpopular laws that would create ill-feeling between the rulers and the ruled. The Bill for raising the age of consent recently brought forward by the Honourable Sir Andrew Scoble is likely to cause widespread discontent among the people. We do not think Government, in thus giving countenance to a handful of reformers, who are backed by a few Christian missionaries, desire to enrage the people. We recommend Government not to interfere in the social customs of the people unless the latter seek their assistance, and not to spread discontent by their over-zealousness. It is no secret that the present Bill directly interferes with the religious rites of the Hindus. It would have been somewhat reasonable if the age of consent had been fixed at attainment of puberty, as it is considered sinful among Hindus to live separate from their wives after the first appearance of it. It is the duty of every Hindu to move the British Parliament in respect of this Bill, as it will lead to the transportation of many married persons.

PART III.—Education.

Discontinuance by the Bombay University of the system of supplying marks to students who have failed in its examinations disapproved.

26. The Sind Times (7), in its issue of the 8th January, writes:—We think the Bombay University will do well to reconsider their decision to discontinue furnishing marks to students who have failed in the University examinations. Unless they are of opinion that it would be far better to let students remain in ignorance of the particular branch in which they are deficient and thus to cause them to re-study the whole course, we do not see any reason for their foregoing the usual practice. The students have always been prepared to pay for this privilege, and as this is the nucleus of a decent income, we do not think the objection to supplying unsuccessful candidates with the 'marks' they have obtained in each paper can be very great. Last year the sum derived from this item amounted to about Rs. 700, the fee charged to each student being 8 annas. It may be that the labour entailed is not adequately paid for with so small a sum. All that can be done is then to raise the amount of the fee. But this would scarcely be just to students, as the total sum accumulated could easily enable the management to engage a man for the purpose. It is not at all necessary that students should see the results of their efforts; but there is always a certain amount of satisfaction one feels on knowing exactly how he has done in an examination, and we have no doubt that the favour (as, after all, that is what it really is) would be greatly esteemed.

PART IV.—Municipalities.

Jerry buildings in Bombay and the alleged neglect on the part of the local municipality.

27. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 11th January, writes:—Whenever the efficiency of the Bombay municipal departments is called into question, especially of the Engineering Department, the plea is set forth that it is undermanned, that but for lack of hands the department would work wonders in the way of supervision and control. The latest occasion for this plea is the collapse of a house in Bengalpura with a fearful loss of life. The public are familiar with the plea; they expect it to be obtruded whenever the department is charged with negligence. In this case the officers in charge ought to have grown wiser by experience. They knew that bad material was used now and then for building purposes and they could prevent it without an overstraining of the nerves. We are not sure as to the present strength of the department. But what is one to think of the self-respect of its officers and of their concern for the lives and the limbs of the rate-paying community who continue cheerfully in office while they know the department under them to be so wanting in the requisite strength as to admit of such terrible accidents taking place? Either they are destitute of a sense of responsibility, or the plea they set forth is more or less the result of after-thought. Either way public opinion holds them very heavily to blame. Here they have to account for the murder and mutilation of nearly ninety persons; surely, want of hands is no explanation now. As to the shares of the builders of the house in this painful business, they will have to explain it before a properly constituted court; but we cannot help saying that the cupidity of house-builders in Bombay would hardly find such free scope under efficient control and supervision by the municipality. Apart from the question of choice as to whether the local municipality should have additional income by levying a higher duty on the food-grain of masses or by raising the house-tax in town, what we fail to see is if additional income is absolutely necessary. We fear the Bombay Municipality has been spoiled by an over-indulgence in "fresh supplies." For years have we observed that increased expenditure on the departments has brought very little of increased efficiency. As to the other point, we are unable to follow Mr. Mulji Bhawánidás. If reduction in the duty on grain has failed to bring down prices generally for the poor, will an enhancement of the duty reduce the market rates? Quite the contrary. It is a common experience that dealers raise their prices quite out of proportion in case of the slightest increase of duty, while they maintain the same prices in case of reduced rates. This mischief appears to have been lost sight of.

Disapproval of the enhancement of the grain duty by the Bombay Municipality.

28. The Native Opinion (16), in its issue of the 11th January, writes:—With an opening balance of four lakhs and odd, and with an estimated income of fifty-nine lakhs, the Bombay Municipal Corporation has deemed it proper to raise the duty on grain to 4 annas per candy, notwithstanding the fact that it had deliberately reduced it to 2 annas a couple of years ago. The return expected from this objectionable enhancement is Rs. 93,000. This sum is required not for any necessary project, but for luxuries, viz., the experimental lighting of the Fort and its vicinity with electricity, the making of new roads in the Victoria Gardens, the construction of a new bungalow for the Superintendent, &c. Could not all these have waited for another year? Or could not the amount have been found out by economy in other branches? It is really a misfortune to the poor that their food should be made dearer by the so-called city fathers! Are the finances of the municipality in a prosperous condition? What do Dr. Blaney and financial experts like the Honourable Mr. Yájnik and Mr. D. E. Wacha say? The picture is certainly gloomy and it is time the affairs are closely looked into.

Comments on the Government resolution about the Poona Municipality.

29. The Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 15th January, while writing on the recent resolution of the Bombay Government on the Poona Municipality and its ways, expresses surprise at Government insisting upon the appointment of an independent executive officer for the municipality under the existing District Municipal Act, and says that Government should get the Act amended before such an officer is appointed.

30. The Bombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 15th January, says:—If the Poona municipal commissioners are really guilty of the mis-management laid to their charge by the Bombay Government in their recent resolution, they deserve the severe censure passed upon them. To avoid similar laxity in future it has been suggested by Government that a paid executive officer should be appointed, but it does not appear that this arrangement will necessarily cure the evil. There is no reason to believe that if the commissioners continue to be lax in the discharge of their duties there will be no mismanagement under the administration of the executive officer similar to that of which the commissioners have been accused. There can therefore be no good in imposing on the rate-payers of Poona the burden of the salary of the proposed executive officer. The proper course would be that the commissioners should be made to watch carefully every item of expenditure incurred by the corporation.—The Jáme Jamshed (109), in its issue of the same date, observes that it would have been better if Government had obtained from the Poona Municipality an explanation of the accusations preferred against it by the Collector before passing a resolution on the subject, that if the corporation is really guilty of lax management it deserves all the severe censure passed upon it by Government, that the appointment of an executive officer is not needed at all, and that the necessary improvement in the administration can be effected by able and better paid secretary and health officer.

Complaint about the imposition of a toll-tax at Surat.

31. The Gujarát Darpan (83), in its issue of the 15th January, observes:—The imports into the town of Surat have declined considerably within the last ten years, as the big traders store and sell their goods outside the municipal limits in order to evade municipal taxation, and the new toll-tax of two annas on a cart each time it happens to cross or re-cross the municipal limits, as well as the tax of a pie on every headload of goods of howsoever trifling a value, have created great dissatisfaction among petty traders and others. We therefore recommend the corporation to duly consider the memorial which several commissioners are shortly going to submit to the President.

Part V.—Native States.

32. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 12th January, says:—The education at present imparted to the Native Princes in the Rájkumár Colleges is not what it should be. It only makes them regular, neat, honest, liberal-minded, jolly, appreciative, &c. In fact, they thereby acquire qualities possessed by an English gentleman, along with some English vices which it would be better not to enumerate. But the education required to make a good administrator is, in the opinion of some men, purposely kept out of reach. Some people say that this education can be better imparted by the advice and association with them of able and experienced administrators like Rája Sir T. Mádhav Ráo or Diwán Bahádur Raghunáth Ráo than in schools and colleges, and there is much truth in their assertion. In order to become good rulers the Princes should be made to study critically the lives of eminent rulers like Akbar, Peshwa Bájiráo I, Peter the Great, Charles V, and others. They should know the advantages of a representative government and the difference between the present condition of the Native States and that before the administration of Lord Dalhousie, and the causes of this difference. As it is, the Princes cannot be blamed if they do not turn out good rulers, for the responsibility of this rests with the British Government, and the latter should relieve themselves of it as soon as possible.

A request to Government not to sanction the exorbitant sum of 22 lakhs of rupees for the wedding of the Mahárája Scindia.

33. The Kaiser-i-Hind (87) and the Rájyabhakta (121), in their issues of the 11th and 13th January, respectively, disapprove of the proposed outlay of 22 lakhs of rupees on the wedding of Mahárája Scindia, who is a minor, and say that since Government are the trustees of the Gwalior State they should withhold their sanction. The Rájyabhakta adds that Government have already broken their promise to the late Mahárája Scindia by appointing a European tutor to the young Prince, and if they sanction this heavy expenditure, people might think that lavish expenditure is encouraged with a view to empty the Gwalior treasury and to declare the Council of Regency unfit.

Remarks on the reply of the Bombay Government to the memorial of the Bombay committee formed to help the Cambay sufferers.

34. The Gujarát Darpan (83), in its issue of the 11th January, writes:—The reply of the Bombay Government to the memorial of the Bombay committee formed to help the Cambay sufferers shows His Excellency to be unwilling to make further inquiries. The reason assigned is that the rumours about the conduct of the troops, accepted by the memorialists as true, have been disproved after a careful and impartial inquiry. It is also thought that no benefit would result from a departure from the well-known rule which treats the affairs of a foreign State as matters to be discussed with reserve and with especial respect and consideration for a sovereign in subordinate alliance with Her Majesty. We wish Government would always observe the rule. How many times have we seen it broken? Is it because some British officers are implicated in the sad events at Cambay that the Government has grown so considerate for the sovereigns in subordinate alliance with Her Majesty? The world does not know what inquiry the Government has made except that instituted by Mr. James, whereas the deputation of the committee being in a position to mix with the people and open to all, made the minutest search into the affair and made their report accordingly. It was on the strength of this report that the memorial was drawn up. A public inquiry would have cleared everything in connection with the mal-administration at Cambay. It is a pity that Government does not vouchsafe any reply to the request of the committee for an inquiry into the conduct of Mr. Shámráo Laud.

35. The Gujaráti (84), in its issue of the 11th January, considers the reply of the Bombay Government to the memorialists as unsatisfactory, says that Government ought to call for a full explanation from Messrs. Cooke and Shámráo who caused the innocent cultivators of Cambay to be slaughtered, and to take such measures as would satisfy the public completely, as the present action of Government regarding these officers reflects upon the credit of the British administration and will cause alarm to the subjects of other Native States. [The Kaiser-i-Hind (87), in its issue of the same date, observes:—Government have at last been compelled to express publicly their opinion on the Cambay affair, but the statement is very disappointing. Some of the members of the committee for the relief of the Cambay sufferers went to Cambay and collected the facts connected with the disaster, and their inquiries are therefore more reliable than the official reports, and we are glad that the committee has decided to take further steps in the matter. The Surya Prakásh (90) and the Hindusthán (108), in their issues of the 10th and 11th January, respectively, express similar sentiments.]

36. The Svadesh Bandhu (131), in its issue of the 14th January, observes:—The reply of the Bombay Government to the memorial from the committee for the relief of the Cambay sufferers on the subject of misgovernment in Cambay does not show which of the allegations made by the memorialists have been found untrue. If all the allegations are incorrect, one fails to understand the reason of the withdrawal of powers from the Nawáb for a term of two years. Nobody desires that Government should deprive the Nawáb of his powers. If a public inquiry be not held and speedy action be not taken against Mr. Shámráo, against whom the memorialists have laid several specific charges, people will be led to believe that the matter has been hushed up on account of his great influence and as Messrs. Cooke and Summers are concerned in it.

Disapproval of expenses incurred by Native Chiefs of Káthiáwár during the visit of European officers to their States and a request to His Excellency Lord Harris.

37. The Satyavakta (124), in its issue of the 16th January, observes:—While the Native Chiefs and Princes of Central India and some other parts spend reasonable sums on the reception of representatives of the Queen, it is much to be regretted that the Native Chiefs of Káthiáwár should be extravagant on similar occasions. Almost every year they incur heavy expenses for such purposes, which do no good either to themselves or to their subjects; and we would advise them to be moderate hereafter. They also spend some money in making arrangements for the boarding, lodging, conveyance, &c., of the European officers of the province during their official visits to their States, and we recommend His Excellency Lord Harris to inquire into the matter and issue a resolution prohibiting Government servants from putting the States under their charge to such expenses, as these officers receive travelling allowance in addition to their salary.

Annoyance said to be caused by Mekránis in the Bágasra Táluka of the Káthiáwár Agency.

38. A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 12th January, says:—For some time past the Mekránis have given much trouble in the Bágasra Táluka of the Káthiáwár Agency. Last month the chief constable of the táluka arrested two Mekránis for carrying arms without a license. Since then the holder of certain service land in the village of Rafáli belonging to Harsárvála, the Chief of Bágasra, has been murdered, but the murder has not been traced as yet. It is now reported that a placard was stuck on the gate of the village of Pundhiasar, in which the writer threatens to call upon the villagers within a fortnight to answer for the arrest of his two Mekráni brethren by the chief constable of Bágasra. This placard has been removed and taken by the constable to the Thánedár.

1. The Pramod Sindhu (1), in its issue of the 9th January, writes:—The visit of the Resident is an event of great importance in Berár. It is not often that Her Majesty's representative at Hyderabad can be spared from his political duties at the Deccan Court to do the purely administrative work of a cold weather tour in a part of the country at considerable distance from his head-quarters. A visit of this kind is looked forward to with great expectations by nearly every one. The sportively inclined hope to have the pleasures of the turf. The heart of the gay beats at the prospect of a ball. The pure office man arranges his papers, prepares statements, and waits with some confidence to be commended, while the local associations display great activity, arrange for Pánsupári and other similar receptions, and the public at large feel anxious to hear from the lips of the august head of the administration important announcements about various schemes and general lines of policy with regard to local matters. We are sorry to say that the present visit is barren of all results like these. There has been no grand reception, no speeches nor public functions of any kind, except on one occasion, which was, to say the least of it, a very poor apology for a public function when the Resident received the members of the District Board and the Town Municipality in the verandah of Colonel Mackenzie's bungalow. The substance of his utterance in reply to the addresses is characterized by his usual caution and the experienced wisdom of an old officer, and the portion about the building sites within municipal limits will be read with great interest. Sir Dennis FitzPatrick was of opinion that the revenue derived by letting or selling these is strictly imperial, and its grant to a municipality was to be looked upon as a favour and not of right. He added that while in Assam he recommended that the municipalities should get the revenue, and said enough to indicate that a similarly favourable decision would be given here also. The visit has been, however, productive of great good in a quiet way. The old office routines have been carefully revised, institutions of interest visited and new energy infused into their management. It has also revealed that we have at the head of our affairs a thorough hard-working gentleman of great and almost exceptional capacity, who, in office, is a stern master and strong administrator, but in private life, is a kind gentleman, exceedingly polite, and a very pleasant host.

The Resident's tour in Berár.

2. The same newspaper writes:—A very useful public servant left Berár last week. Khán Bahádur Shamsudin Alikhán, Special Assistant Commissioner, Amráoti, is a very experienced officer, having been nearly twenty years on the bench. He is exceedingly straight-forward and perfectly impartial. His decisions were always marked by great judicial acumen and characterized by a thorough knowledge of law and the tendencies of litigants. The record of his services is highly complimentary, and Dame Rumour has it that recent appointments in the grade of Deputy Commissioners gave reason to the Khán Bahádur to be dissatisfied, and his going on long leave is attributed to the same cause. If there is any truth in this, as perhaps there is, we are very sorry that Berár has lost, at least for a short time, the services of so valuable an officer.

Khán Bahádur Shamsudin Alikhán, Special Assistant Commissioner, Amráoti.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

The recent fire at Poona and a recommendation to Government for the relief of the distressed.

1. While writing about the recent fire at Poona and the distress of owners of the houses consumed in the conflagration, the Poona Vaibhav (54), in its issue of the 18th January, recommends Government and the citizens of Poona to take speedy measures for the relief of the sufferers, and remarks that since Government appropriate the treasure troves found by their subjects, it is incumbent on them to relieve the latter from the calamities befalling them from the violence of natural agencies like fire, water, wind, &c.

The social reformers and their reforms.

2. If all social reform, as the so-called reformers seem to contend, consists in eating beef and other flesh, drinking liquor, keeping girls unmarried till they are eighteen or twenty years old, abstaining from shaving widows' heads, permitting them to remarry, dining at the house of anybody without distinction of caste or creed and disregarding contamination by unclean or impure touch, why are not, asks the same newspaper, the Mahárs, Mángs and other low-castes, among whom all these practices obtain very extensively, looked upon as reformed and civilized, and why are they not associated with by the reformers instead of meddling with the Bráhman and other castes by whom these practices are discarded on being found after long experience to be harmful and undesirable, though they once existed among them?

Satisfaction expressed at the decisions of Mr. Hamilton, Second Presidency Magistrate, Bombay.

3. The Rást Goftár (88), in its issue of the 18th January, writes:—As faithful exponents of Native opinion, we are glad to record the satisfaction which the public of Bombay feels at the strong common sense, prudence and discretion with which Mr. Hamilton, Second Presidency Magistrate, is guided in deciding cases before him of more than ordinary interest to the people. Numerous cases under special Acts affecting the rights of the public, and especially the poorer classes, come before the Presidency Magistrates, in which many outside circumstances, besides the strict letter of the law, are to be weighed in the balance, and the intentions of the framers of the law are also to be considered. In the short time during which Mr. Hamilton has re-occupied the bench, he has, in disposing of several such cases, exercised sound discretion, whilst administering the law, in judging of the hardships which a strict adherence to it would entail on the poor. At Mr. Hamilton's instance the High Court has been given an opportunity of recording an important ruling on the question of a Magistrate's jurisdiction over inquiries held by the Coroner; and it was Mr. Hamilton's judgment again which, though reversed, drew forth from the High Court an important decision, pointing out the great hardships which the poor are made to suffer from the recent introduction of an unfortunate section in the Salt Act. We need only refer, in passing, to this careful and considerate Magistrate's recent ruling against the levying of license-fees on coffee and tea shops—a demand destructive of teetotalism—and this week, again, Mr. Hamilton has pronounced strongly from the bench against the absurdity of levying a double set of municipal fees on paper manufacture, first, for manufacturing paper, and, secondly, for the storage of rags. With this judicious view of public evils and other practical qualifications, we have no doubt that Mr. Hamilton will make himself as popular and efficient a Magistrate as Mr. Crawley-Boevey, whose name is still remembered by the grateful public.

Heavy fine inflic ed by the Acting Third Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, on a Pársi for resisting a police officer in the execution of his duty disapproved.

4. The Bombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 24th January, disapproves of a fine of Rs. 100, or in default two months' simple imprisonment, inflicted by the Acting Third Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, on a Pársi who was convicted of the charge of resisting a police officer in the execution of his duty, as a heavy punishment, observing that Native policemen act very respectfully towards Europeans while they conduct themselves very superciliously towards Natives, and at times even make assaults on them, and that encouragement to such policemen by heavily fining persons who oppose them is sure to make them more oppressive to the people.

A complaint against Mr. Danjisháh Dádábhái, Acting Superintendent of Police, Thána.

5. The Din Bandhu (10), in its issue of the 18th January, writes disparagingly of the Acting Superintendent of Police, Thána, saying that in three recent cases prosecuted at his instance, and on which a pretty large sum of public money was wasted, the accused have been acquitted, that the Superintendent, from the way in which he does things, does not appear to be careful and cautious in the performance of his duties, that Government should make him pay the large amount of money which has been expended on the prosecution of the Ogivale dacoity case recently tried in the Thána Sessions Court in which a son of the well-known Police Inspector, Ráo Sáheb Ganpatráo Bokad, was one of the accused, that the cost of the defence in the case incurred by Ráo Sáheb Bokad amounting to between Rs. 4,000 and 5,000 should be paid to him by Government, and that after an enquiry into the fitness of the Police Superintendent for his post Government should issue such orders as they may deem fit.

Swindlers in Bombay and the local police.

6. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 19th January, describes several of the tricks practised in Bombay by professional swindlers to defraud individuals of thousands of rupees, and blames the local police for not exerting themselves to bring them to account.

Frequency of thefts at Mahudha in the Kaira District.

7. The Svadesh Bandhu (130), in its issue of the 21st January, gives details of several cases of theft at Mahudha in the Kaira District during the last week, and says that the inhabitants of that town have been greatly alarmed at this and are at their wits' end for the safety of their property.

Five or six persons are reported to have been killed by two tigers near Chás in the Khed Táluka of the Poona District.

8. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 18th January, writes:—We hear that two tigers have made their appearance near Chás in the Khed Táluka of the Poona District. Five or six persons are reported to have fallen victims to their man-eating propensities in the course of a fortnight. Such accidents must continue to happen so long as people are without weapons for self-defence. It is however hoped that the authorities concerned will look to the matter early.

Part II.—Legislation.

Approval of and remarks on the Age of Consent Bill and the speeches made at its first reading in the Viceregal Legislative Council.

9. The Kaiser-i-Hind (87), in its issue of the 18th January, writes:—It may be justly observed that in politics as in road-making the practical man resorts to easy gradients. The more he is convinced of the enormity of the evil which he is attacking and of the formidable obstacles which he has to overcome, the more anxious must he be to minimise the inevitable friction, and take not the shortest cut, but the smoothest road to the goal. The Government of India has, be it said to its credit, uniformly endeavoured not only to carefully bear in mind this wise political maxim, but to act up to it with the best of its light and wisdom, in matters deeply affecting the social and religious habits and usages of millions of its Indian subjects shrouded under the panoply of conservatism at least three thousand years old. In the Bill just introduced into the Supreme Legislative Council for altering the age of consent from ten to twelve, the Government has afforded one more proof of its great anxiety to avoid the road which is beset with gigantic obstacles and endless friction in matters of social legislation. It has judiciously steered clear of the shoals and quicksands on which many a legislative bark often wrecks even in the civilised countries of the West. The admirable speech of the Viceroy is a clear and unmistakable indication of the position which his Government is determined to adopt with regard to the burning social problems which have been agitating the hearts of the more ardent and enthusiastic reformers during the last five years and upwards. The cardinal principle of the position taken up seems to us to be none other than this, that the Government will proceed most cautiously and on the lines which offer the least resistance.

10. The Rást Goftár (88), in its issue of the 18th January, writes:—Sir Andrew Scoble's speech in moving the amendments in the Indian Penal and Criminal Procedure Codes for raising the age of consent from ten to twelve was a lucid exposition of the objects and reasons which have led to the introduction of the Bill. It was a blot upon the statute book that the age of consent should have been fixed so low as ten years, and the raising of it to twelve is but a very small modicum of reform. This is, however, sufficient for the present, on the principle followed by Government of advancing slowly. Sir Romesh Chandra Mitter was the only opponent of the Bill. He contended that with Hindus the laws of the Shástras were supreme, that the Shástras enjoined cohabitation with the wife on her attaining puberty, that the husband would commit a sin if he did not then consummate his marriage, that in this country puberty was reached in some cases even before the age of twelve, and that in that case the orthodox Hindu husband would be placed in a dilemma, that is, he must either break the law or disregard the injunctions of the sacred Shástras. The Shástras are held, no doubt justly, in great reverence by Hindus. But considerations of reason and humanity must be held to be above even the Shástras, where the latter come into conflict with them. The Shástras could not have contemplated the immature ravishment of girls, but if they did, then the Shástras must give way to science. The argument against the Bill reduces itself simply to this, that a very few children arrive at premature puberty before the age of twelve, and therefore, if they happen to be married, they must be victimised. Although puberty may appear, still cohabitation at such a tender age might involve serious risk or cause some permanent injury to the victim. But they must be immolated on the shrine of religion, according to this enlightened gentleman, some time Chief Justice of the Calcutta High Court.

11. The Dnyánodaya (12), in its issue of the 22nd January, writes:—Although the Bill for raising the age of consent does not go the length we think it should, one cannot but view with satisfaction the thought that the Supreme Legislature has taken up the cause of suffering child-wives. The Bill may fall far short of what it should be, but it is on the right path, and for that all must be thankful. If the age of consent is raised from ten to twelve now, it can be raised to fourteen hereafter with less trouble than now. Notwithstanding the absurd and almost wicked cry that such legislation is contrary to the Hindu religion, raised by a few who have very little knowledge of the requirements of true religion, we believe the mass of India's good-hearted people will be in sympathy with the Bill and rejoice when it is passed. If the Hindu religion prevents the tender little ones from being protected, of what use is that religion to India? Is there no significance in the fact that it has to devolve on Christians to plead for merciful laws for widows and child-wives? We are comforted by the thought that the opposition of orthodox or heterodox Hindus to such merciful legislation will drive the better minds to that religion that cares for the helpless and weak.

12. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 18th January, writes:—The statement and remarks with which the Honourable Mr. Scoble introduced the Age of Consent Bill impress one with the fact that the honourable gentleman in charge of the Bill enjoys the combined advantages of knowledge and sympathy. For quiet, manly dignity, implying a determination to do what he conceives to be right, Sir Andrew Scoble's remarks will be long remembered in the annals of Anglo-Indian legislation. Unfortunately, in accepting the lowest possible standard, the Law Member appears to have ignored recent experience and the consensus of medical opinion, Indian as well as European, that has so materially helped the question to a point. However, considering the ways of the Indian Legislature in such matters, and the attitude of the present head of the Government, we must make the best of the situation. A great principle has been vindicated so far, as in the case of the Ilbert Bill, and we are content for the while to let the popular mind be familiarized with this slightly raised standard of moral duty. His Excellency the Viceroy's answer to

Sir R. Mitter appears to have been effective and far-reaching. The limit of age should be raised for the protection of helpless female children. His Excellency pointed out that if in one respect the proposed amendment made the law more stringent, in another respect it took greater precautions than before against an abuse of the law. This is an advantage the opponents cannot fail to appreciate. So far as regards the first resolution of the London Committee. As regards the remaining three, more or less, Lord Lansdowne seems to have joined issue with his distinguished predecessors and former colleagues in office. The London Committee is not incapable of trying conclusions with him, nor does it insist upon everyone of its recommendations being adopted forthwith. But it strikes us as rather curious that His Excellency should lay so much stress on his "closer contact" with the people of India than he seemed willing to allow to men who have been much longer in this country and have had a closer and much more varied experience. However, that by the way. We have no wish to embarrass the Government. They mean well, and we readily give them credit even for their intentions. Lord Lansdowne is justified to some extent in the views he expressed as regards the ratification of infant marriages, as he understood it. The point that His Excellency seems to have missed is this: whatever the people of India may do with regard to infant marriage, why should a non-interfering foreign Government be so eager to sanction and enforce the consequences following from the ceremony? Are the Government bound to be a party to an irrational system which has proved the bane of the country, and which is opposed alike to common sense and to the laws of nature? We thought we had made it clear that what the party of reform wanted at the hands of Government was not interference, but withdrawal from interference. His Excellency's remarks as to suits for the so-called restitution of conjugal rights appear to us to have been still less to the point. That cases under this law are infrequent is no argument in favour of maintaining it, when we know that the suit is un-Indian, an importation from Christian countries, and that it has been repudiated even in those countries where adult marriages obtain. Is it fair that the suit should be perpetuated in India on the top of non-consensual infant marriages which bind down the wives during the lifetime of their husbands, and even after that, while they leave the husbands at liberty to have as many more wives as they like, and at any time? Is it for the non-interfering British Legislature to force the wife, under such circumstances, to submit to the husband or to accept imprisonment as the only alternative? That was the question before Government. From the grudging manner in which His Excellency offered a concession in this regard, one would think it went sorely against his grain. No doubt, he has administrative difficulties to deal with in settling such questions, and we would fain leave him a free hand there. On the other hand, we think we have a right to insist upon a clear apprehension by Government of the principles that underlie the points at issue. In dealing with the resolution to remove any legal obstacles still standing in the way of the remarriage of widows, Lord Lansdowne must be admitted to have made good use of his opportunities. There is no gainsaying the general drift of his arguments. But here, too, His Excellency seems to have entirely lost sight of the offer made by Lord Dufferin's Government in their resolution of 8th October 1886. This is an unfortunate omission for one who has evidently taken some pains to look into the question. We equally regret his misconception of the views so ably enunciated by the correspondent of the Times, whose letters on the subject have done so much to bring it within the sphere of practical politics. The writer of those letters commands a special knowledge of the subject, such as very few others can boast of. His letters are the result not only of prolonged and intimate acquaintance, but also of anxious consultation with Hindu authorities, especially on the Bengal side. We ourselves happen to differ from some few of his conclusions, but they are none the less entitled to consideration. It seems his views would be better appreciated if the writer had time to express them in a less technical form. We may revert to Lord Lansdowne's speech, which is singularly lucid and outspoken. If we cannot afford to be equally outspoken at this moment, we shall still endeavour to point out the errors of some of his assumptions as well as arguments. Meanwhile, it only remains for us to thank the Government of India for the beginning they have made with the new year. We assure them, as we have assured our Hindu countrymen throughout, that we want nothing more than that Her Majesty's Gracious Proclamation of 1858 be utilized in this behalf, in its spirit as in its letter, and that a righteous and progressive Government make such social reform possible amongst the people as they can by correcting their own mistakes of law and policy.

13. The Káthiáwár Times (3), in its issue of the 16th January, writes :— Barring one grave objection, of which we shall say presently, there is very little which would justify opposition to the Bill which Sir C. Andrew Scoble laid before the Legislative Council on Friday last for raising the age of consent from ten to twelve for married and unmarried girls, for the measure being framed along the line of least resistance is worthy of cordial support by the reformers and the anti-reformers. It must be conceded by all persons who have any knowledge of the frailty of human nature that such a legal check is necessary to restrain men from taking advantage of their marital right prematurely. We will not dispute the right and duty of the State to interfere for the protection of any class of subjects where a decided necessity exists for such interference and where the religious precepts of a community suffer in no way. It appears that no ordinary care has been taken by Sir Andrew Scoble in framing the Bill. It is very cautiously framed and is surprisingly moderate, and that is one of the principal causes why it should be adopted without further obstruction. Its objects are twofold—the protection of female children from immature prostitution, and from premature cohabitation. No one can deny that it will act as a powerful deterrent in checking the training of females for the life of vice from a tender age, and that the villains who now manage to escape with impunity from merited punishment on the ground that the victims had consented to the outrage will not now go unpunished. Though the existing law is adequate in some respects to cope with the mischief intended to be guarded against by the Age of Consent Bill, yet we see no harm in adopting additional precautions. The grave objection to the Bill which we alluded to at the outset is the contention that Hindu Shástras demand not only that girls should be married before they reach puberty, but that as soon as puberty is reached consummation of marriage must take place. As very often puberty is reached before girls attain the age of twelve, it is contended that husbands, according to the Shástras, would commit sin if they did not then consummate marriage. On this line Sir Romesh Chandra Mitter opposed the Bill, but his opposition, is not such as should prove of much avail, for the Hindu religious authorities, as pointed out by Mr. Nulkar, are so varied and contradictory that it is often difficult to decide as to which of them ought to be accepted and followed in preference to others. We think even the opponents of the Bill will have the good sense to admit that Mr. Nulkar's argument in support of the Bill carries conviction. The Viceroy has taken a very cautious view and he has been throughout very guarded in his speech, especially on the conjugal rights question—an attitude deserving of praise rather than censure.

14. The Subodh Patrika (18), in its issue of the 18th January, writes :— To our humble judgment, Sir Romesh Mitter's speech opposing the Bill does not show such a full and fair grasp of the situation as one might reasonably have expected from a gentleman of his learning, culture and judicial experience. In the whole of the speech there is not one word of abhorrence for the custom which the Bill seeks to put down. He is tender towards the Shástras ; he is full of sympathy for bigotry and blind usage : but he has not a word of compassion for the child-wife, when in the name of religion he asks the Legislature to let ravishment on her alone! Nor is there any adherence in his speech to any settled and consistent principle. The key-note of it is the promise given by Her Majesty not to interfere with religion ; but Sir Romesh does not follow the inference he draws from the Bill in support of his opposition to that Bill by asking for the repeal of the existing law, which, if his position be sound, ought to be removed from the statute book. Sir Romesh, in fact, contents himself with adopting a deprecatory tone towards the Bill and takes his stand on party lines, instead of looking at the question from a practical statesman's point of view and having due regard to the limitations and qualifications subject to which the Legislature and the State have observed the principle of non-interference with religion. Sir Romesh's speech is all the more to be regretted, since it is not only not conceived in a spirit of practical and cautious enlightenment, but is ill-suited to inform or guide our alien rulers, who are told by him in extremely vague terms not to interfere with religion, but who do not receive from him any light as to the important question whether a State is bound to tolerate every inhuman and barbarous act perpetrated in the name of religion. In India every question may be made to fall within the category of religion—even murder; and all government will be at a deadlock if religion is invoked to support heinous acts. The position taken by Sir Romesh becomes all the more unfortunate for the country at a time when we are seeking for a responsible share in the administration. In all these respects his speech contrasts very unfavourably with the terse observations of the Honourable Mr. Nulkar, which put the question involved in Sir Andrew Scoble's measure in a nutshell. Mr. Nulkar has, in fact, to some extent tried to repair the mischief done by Sir Romesh, and to save the credit of educated Natives on this side of India at least.

15. As regards the observation of the Honourable Mr. Nulkar that the opposition to the Age of Consent Bill and the fear of Government interference with the Hindu marriage customs are due to the agitation of social reformers, the same newspaper writes:—The action of the reformers in question is not without justification. They appealed to the Legislature for a law regulating the minimum marriageable age, only when they found that society could do nothing of itself. All the talk about "reform from within" has been found after the experience of many years to be hollow. The caste system has no vitality left in it for the promotion of any reform. It has power left only to perpetuate bad customs, but for any progressive work it can hardly be counted upon. Societies have been formed; pledges have been taken for the promotion of marriage reform, but their history is a staring proof of the fact that little can be done by our people when the reform of social abuses affecting women in particular is left to them. As the proceedings of the last National Congress show most incontestibly, the very men who say that Government ought not to pass any law affecting the marriage question, because such a law would be an interference with their religion, are prepared themselves to treat that very religion with contempt, to set aside orthodoxy for the attainment of political power. What does this show but that our men will not care for religion or orthodoxy where their own selfish interests are concerned, whereas they wish to invoke the support of that very religion and orthodoxy where the interests of women are involved? Under these circumstances the social reformers who have appealed for legislative interference had no other alternative left but to call for that interference. They found that our men would merely talk and do nothing where woman's cause was concerned, and events have justified their action.

16. The Phœnix (5), in its issue of the 14th January, writes:—Considered by themselves, Sir Romesh Chandra's arguments do not appear very forcible. He said that in Bengal it was a matter of religion to consummate marriage when some physical conditions appeared which might happen before the age of twelve. This argument would apply with equal force to the present age limit. There are instances in which "the physical conditions" referred to have appeared before the age of ten years, and yet consummation under that age, even if sanctioned by religion, would be an offence under the existing law. But we doubt, as Mr. Nulkar does, if consummation is a religious injunction and must be fulfilled as soon as a girl arrives at puberty. It may be a superstitious notion owing to the growth of animalism, but it cannot be anything better. Beyond everything, however, the interests of humanity require that even the cloak of religion should not be allowed to protect a custom which is perhaps worse than brutal and fatal to the healthy propagation of an important branch of the human race. Thanks to Mr. Malabari's earnestness and sincerity of zeal, and also to another clear-headed and modest worker in the cause of social reform, who has put the case for the raising of the age of consent with remarkable precision and pithiness, a most vitally important reform is about to be launched under the strong hand of the Legislature. The only other small modicum of reform which the Legislature will pass is the penalty of imprisonment which will be removed, to enforce restitution of conjugal rights, so that unwilling wives like Rakhmábái may not be compelled to choose between a loathsome husband and the horrors of a prison.

17. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 19th January, considers the opposition raised by the people in Calcutta to the Age of Consent Bill to be futile, and says:—We hope our countrymen on this side of India will keep their heads cool. After the statement made by the Viceroy it is not possible to raise any alarm about Government interference except by misrepresentation. There is reason to think that incorrect notions about the scope of the Bill are still entertained by the common people. This misapprehension should be dispelled by friends of the Bill with the aid of leaflets, placards or public lectures. Every effort should be made to infuse among the people a correct knowledge of the intentions of the Government. If the public is well informed, it is possible that we may be saved from the unseemly agitation that threatens to convulse Calcutta.

18. The Hindusthán (108), in its issue of the 18th January, observes:—The Bill does not in any way interfere with the religion of the people and it is the duty of Government to protect young girls from the brutal conduct of their fanatic husbands. The Hindu Shástras do not require that girls under twelve years should begin their married life, and the orthodox people simply oppose the Bill on the false ground of its tendency to come in the way of religion, which fixes only the marriageable age of girls. It is wrong to expect that in Hindu social matters any progress will ever be made from within, and just as Government are bound to punish murderers, so are they bound to punish such husbands as would cohabit with their wives of tender age. Government ought not to listen to the masses as they do not understand their own interests, and should be guided by such men as have the interests of the country at heart. The raising of the age of consent will result in much good to the people, who must thank Government and the reformers for the new law.

19. The Broach Mitrá (96), in its issue of the 21st January, observes:—There is every probability of the Bill being passed into a law, and it is therefore advisable for the leading gentlemen of the Hindu community to suggest such changes as would make the law suitable to them instead of protesting against the Bill. If Government intend to interfere with the religious rites of the Hindus in spite of vehement opposition, they should do away altogether with the provision of imprisonment for enforcing a decree for the restitution of conjugal rights, as that is a point on which there is no difference of opinion.

20. The Sudhárak (19) of the 19th January is very glad that the Age of Consent Bill is about to be passed notwithstanding the silly and factious arguments brought against it by the orthodox people, highly approves of the speeches of the Honourable Sir Andrew Scoble and Mr. Nulkar in support of the measure, and says that there is nothing surprising in Sir Romesh Chandra Mitter having attempted to oppose the Bill declaring consummation of marriage before the age of twelve to be illegal and liable to be punished with transportation, as he belongs to that part of the country where the zenana system is in full vogue, and where women being prevented by the custom of the country from even looking at men who are not their blood-relations must be anxious to have the company of their husbands comparatively at an earlier stage of life.

21. The Bakul (23) of the 18th January does not think that the Bill in any way interferes with Hindu religion, and says that even if it did, it would be a very desirable thing to set aside unreasonable or cruel injunctions of the Shástras and to legally prohibit premature consummation of marriage, as was the case with the inhuman practice of Sati.

Disapproval of the Age of Consent Bill.

22. The Native Opinion (16), in its issue of the 18th January, disapproves of the Age of Consent Bill, saying that it is plainly in violation of the promise of religious neutrality given in the Queen's Proclamation of 1858, inasmuch as it prohibits the performance of the ceremony of Garbhádhána or consummation of marriage before the age of twelve even though it is enjoined by the Hindu religion on the first appearance of the menses which may take place before the age prescribed in the Bill in question, that Government are ill-advised in bringing forward the Bill in opposition to the sound opinions expressed on the subject by experienced leaders of Hindu society such as Rája Sir T. Mádhav Ráo, Sir Romesh Chandra Mitter and the Honourable Justice Mutu Swámi Iyar of the Madras High Court, and that a handful of men like Mr. Beherámji Malabári and others who are pressing Government to force social reforms on the Hindu society do not at all indicate the consensus of public opinion on the subject, which is entirely against the Bill and looks upon it as a breach of the promise of religious neutrality, Sir Andrew Scoble's and the Viceroy's opinions to the contrary notwithstanding.

23. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 18th January, writes:—The debate that took place in the Viceregal Legislative Council on the introduction of what is known as the Age of Consent Bill is marked by two very opposite characteristic features. That debate is, as will be admitted on all hands, very instructive and interesting in several ways. But it is as rich in some portions of it as it is poor in others. The speech of the Viceroy, it must be admitted, is the speech of the day. Putting aside that part of it which refers directly to the amendment in hand, the remainder will be hailed with delight and satisfaction by all the parties into which Indian society is divided on the question of reform. We congratulate the Viceroy upon the courage he has shown in grappling with the questions raised by the English committee of reform, and cannot adequately praise him for the statesmanship he has exhibited in giving a timely assurance to the Indian society that, whatever the English committee might suggest, the Government of India are, at all events, alive to their own responsibilities and will never allow such wild suggestions to sway its time-honoured policy of religious neutrality. Lord Lansdowne has, we say, conferred a great boon both upon England and India by his wise enunciation and exposition of the absurdity contained in the various resolutions of the English committee, and thus once for all allaying the great irritation that had been provoked by the thoughtless action of a few frenzied Indian individuals. But we are sorry we cannot give to His Lordship the same praise for his utterances relating to the question before the Legislative Council. Indeed, all the speeches bearing upon the point, with the exception of that made by the Honourable Sir Romesh Chandra Mitter, appear to be full of logical fallacies. In fact, reading the whole of the reasoning of the Honourable Sir Andrew Scoble, so carefully given for the purpose of supporting the amendment, one is led to think that the honourable member is driving at quite something else, and one is only surprised when he comes to the end of his speech to find that the whole chain of ratiocination logically leading to one conclusion is made the basis of quite a different inference. Granting all the premisses with which the learned mover starts, it is difficult to see how the proposal to bring all intercourse by a husband with his wife below the age of twelve under the definition of "rape" can be supported. It is a perfect non sequitur. Sir Andrew asserts that the Bill does not conflict with the religious belief of the Hindus, and we can therefore safely infer that if in his own opinion it did as a matter of fact conflict, he would never support it. He is perfectly correct in saying that at all events intelligent Hindu public opinion as well as orthodox religious belief condemns sexual intercourse by a husband with his wife before she has attained puberty. But what we fail to see is how these assertions are consistent with the drawing of the line at twelve. What they do in a correct course of reasoning is that they draw the line at menstruation. But what connection there is between the period of menstruation and the age of twelve is not properly explained. Conceding that a law prohibiting sexual intercourse before menstruation is one which only strengthens the Hindu religious law as understood and observed by the people, we cannot concede that a law prohibiting intercourse before the age of twelve, if there be menstruation, will not conflict with Hindu law. The Bill is defective; firstly, because it permits cohabitation before puberty when the girl does not attain it till thirteen or fourteen; and, secondly, it directly conflicts with Hindu law in cases of married girls attaining puberty before twelve. It is to be moreover regretted that the honourable mover rather misunderstands the function of legislation. He says it will have an educative effect. Now, it is certainly a dangerous doctrine to maintain that the function of law is educational. Law is to a society what grammar is to a language. Neither can and ought legitimately to go in advance of what it is invented to regulate; otherwise we are sure to run the greatest risks and we shall not know where to stop. In every civilized society it is a fact that legislation generally is behind the time, and we fail to see why in this country alone free play should be given to Platonic and experimental legislation. As regards the speech of the Honourable Mr. Nulkar, we are sorry to say that it shows that that honourable gentleman has entirely failed to appreciate the real points at issue. He is not for what is a fact, but for what ought to be a fact according to his own judgment. He treats the argument of Hindu law with contempt, observing as he does that the texts on the point are conflicting. He is not a lawyer and therefore may be excused for his ideas about what lawyers generally understand by Hindu law and custom. But it is really strange that a man of his years and experience should be found talking in such unmeaning phrases. To us his speech is really disappointing. He could indeed have supported the Bill with far better arguments. At all events, we are constrained to say that he spoke like a partisan rather than like a statesman, and his views very well exemplify what has been often asserted that reformers like him do not really represent the people on social questions. The speech of the Honourable Sir R. Mitter, however, redeems the debate from the slough of inaccuracy and fallacy into which it has fallen. Sir Romesh Chandra's authority generally as a lawyer is unquestioned, and he spoke at the Council Board on this question with a peculiar grasp and weight all his own. He has, we think, successfully put the speech of the honourable mover to a judicial analysis and has with great effect exposed the fallacies underlying it. Words from a gentleman of his position will, we hope, have their due effect, and if they have failed to defeat the Bill on the first occasion they will in the end, we are sure, compel the Viceroy and the honourable members into a correct appreciation of the illogical nature of its provisions.

24. The Káthiáwár Times (3), in its issue of the 21st January, writes:—"There is a tremendous agitation all over India, particularly in Bengal, over the Age of Consent Bill introduced by Sir Andrew Scoble. In Calcutta the introduction of the measure was announced by placards containing the following: "The Age of Consent Bill introduced. Dohai Maharanee. Our Religion is in danger." Meetings are being held to vehemently oppose the Bill. It appears that the Viceroy would have declined to do anything with the measure had he not received a mandate from England and had he not been assured that it was a really harmless measure and that the opposition arose from pure ignorance of the aim and scope of the reform, which would disappear as soon as the people came to know of its real nature. Irrespective of the religious aspect of the question, there are other circumstances which demand our careful attention. The Bill is likely to prove a curse to the poor Indians, constituted and circumstanced as they are. It is thus argued: "A couple is married. A rascal lodges information to a constable that the couple had passed the night as man and wife, the girl being below twelve. The constable informs the Magistrate and the husband is hauled up. The case must end in eternal disgrace to the families of the husband and wife, and it also may end in the transportation of the husband." Now this is quite within the range of possibility in a country where perjury is of everyday occurrence. Besides, how are the couple to disprove the charge, and how will they be able to prove perjury on the part of the persons they are maligned by? The Viceroy in his speech seems to have been entirely guided by Sir Andrew Scoble, and he seems to be in this matter only a helpless tool in the hands of others. Although the police cannot run down the people of their own accord, yet the people will be hardly protected. As the Magistrates will have power to haul up any couple at their own will, there is likely to be a great miscarriage of justice and eternal disgrace to entire families. As he will not be at all held responsible for it, any Magistrate can cause the daughter of any man just married being examined by a medical man. As there is no guarantee of advantage being taken of the measure for the satisfaction of revenge, it is quite possible that the measure will be the medium for private malice for disgracing families. The charges may be quashed eventually, but how will the disgrace of being hauled up before a Magistrate and examined by a medical man be wiped off? Besides, very often such cases will result in wholesale murders, for spirited Hindus, such as the Rajputs, will not suffer themselves to be submitted to such ignominy; and the Government will be compelled nolens volens to repeal the Bill within a few months of its being passed into law. The Bill if passed cannot prevent the kind of crime it is intended to suppress. The suggestion that it will have an educative effect upon the people is rather secondary and unimportant. If a husband is sent to jail, what will become of the girl-wife? Who will protect her? Will not she curse the philanthropists who have thus been the cause of her everlasting shame and ruin? Cases like that of Hari Maitee are not of every-day occurrence. Besides, it was proved by medical evidence that Hari Maitee had previous intercourse with his wife, who was a well-developed girl, and who of her own accord had come to her husband on the day she died of bleeding. By passing the Bill we wrong the Hindus. A Hindu is the last person to suffer himself to be meddled with in the matter of religion and in the matter of woman. By passing the Bill we meddle with both. The consequence of this will be in the long run disastrous to the country and discreditable to Government.

25. The Gujaráti (84), in its issue of the 18th January, observes:—Amongst the Hindus marriage is not considered a mere contract, but a religious sacrament, and Government ought to be very careful before interfering with their religious rites. The Bill recently introduced by the Honourable Sir Andrew Scoble is very harsh and Draconian in nature and effect, and it will therefore never be approved of by the Hindu community. The age of consent may be raised to twelve years, but as it is impossible for the husband to commit rape on his wife, Section 375 of the Indian Penal Code, which makes this exercise of one's marital rights an offence, may be abandoned, and a new one in conformity with the Hindu Shástras and popular religious belief, inflicting a nominal punishment in such cases, be made. An ordinary man who ravishes a girl under twelve years ought certainly to meet with condign punishment, but the proposal to prohibit cohabitation in the case of a wife who attains to puberty and is sent to her husband with the due religious ceremonies being performed, does surely interfere with the religious law of the Hindus. It is wrong to say that people have asked for such a law or that it is in conformity with the Hindu Shástras. It seems that His Excellency the Viceroy has introduced the Bill on account of strong pressure exercised by the English committee, and if Government are arbitrary in making it law without the necessary changes the consequences will be very serious. Even in England a man committing adultery with a girl between ten and twelve years is not guilty of rape. The Bill has already created a panic among the people. The police will have opportunities of making inroads upon the privacy of private families, the people at large will have a powerful engine for revenge upon their enemies by reporting against them, several married ladies will have to live separated from their husbands and will besides be reduced to straits, and there will be no harmony and happiness amongst the Hindus. The late Honourable Sir Maxwell Melvill, who was a staunch advocate of social reform, and Sir William Muir have expressed their opinions against such an alteration in the existing law. We therefore recommend that a strong protest be made against the present Bill, and further hope that sensible reformers will also join the movement. Our contemporaries in Gujarát should consider the question very carefully and represent popular opinion on the subject instead of giving their individual opinion without due consideration.

26. The Satyavakta (123), in its issue of the 23rd January, observes:—The Bill has caused a flutter amongst the orthodox community. The Hindus generally pay the utmost respect to the Shástras even at the sacrifice of some worldly good; and there is sure to be a conflict between the religious dictates of the Shástras and those of the Legislature, as the former decree that a girl should be made to cohabit with her husband as soon as she attains puberty. A handful of reformers may be in favour of the Bill, but Government ought to be careful in passing it into a law, as by doing so they will lose the confidence of the people and the matter should be postponed for a few months in order to gauge public opinion about it.

27. The Suryá Prakásh (90), in its issue of the 17th January, observes:—One cannot believe that the Bill has been introduced without any pressure from the English committee, and if this be true people will have just cause to fear, notwithstanding the assurances given by His Excellency the Viceroy to the contrary, that Government would gradually interfere with other social customs, such as infant marriage and widow-marriage. It is not right that Government should interfere in the social customs of the people. A public meeting is shortly to be convened at Calcutta to protest against the Bill, and we would advise its promoters to pass a resolution to carry out the proposed change in their society within a short time without Government interference.

28. The Praja Mat (119), in its issue of the 17th January, observes:—The age of consent was fixed at ten years after mature consideration, and no sufficient reasons have been shown in support of the proposed change. Government ought to have, before introducing the Bill at the instance of a few English ladies and others who are ignorant of Hindu customs, duly considered the protests of the Pandits and other Hindus. If the Bill is passed into a law it will violate the solemn promises made in the Royal Proclamation of 1858.

29. The Satyodayá (124), in its issue of the 22nd January, expresses similar sentiments, and adds that if Government intended to introduce this Bill six months ago, as is alleged, it is not right on their part to have kept the public in ignorance of it so long and taken them by surprise.

30. The Ahmedabad Times (91), in its issue of the 21st January, observes:—The proposed law will do no good to the people, while some innocent persons will be victimised. We therefore recommend the inhabitants of Ahmedabad and other cities to protest against the Bill. If Government have no scruples to interfere in the religious rites of the Hindus under the pretext of protecting young girls, they had better fix the marriageable age of girls rather than raise the age of consent.

31. A correspondent of the Gujarát Darpan (83), in its issue of the 18th January, disapproves of Government interference in the religious rites of the Hindus, which, he says, is owing to there being no representatives of the people in the Legislative Councils and to the law-givers being foreigners and ignorant of the social usages of the people. He also says that it is more difficult to repeal a law than to make it.

32. The Kesari (87), in its issue of the 20th January, praises His Excellency the Viceroy for his earnest desire to respect the promise of religious neutrality given in the Queen's Proclamation and to abstain from interference with Hindu religion, pronounces the opinion expressed by Sir Romesh Chandra Mitter to be the real opinion of the general Native public, censures the Honourable Mr. Nulkar for having made light of the religious feelings of the people and of the injunctions of the Shástras and for having given vent to his own private opinions without attempting to refute the arguments of Sir Romesh and says that the Viceroy and Sir Andrew Scoble have misunderstood the Hindu law on the subject, and that unless the people take pains to undeceive them and to indicate that the general public opinion is against the Bill, the Bill would be passed, involving the whole Native society in unbearable trouble.

33. The Vártáhar (20), in its issue of the 18th January, also thinks that the Honourable Mr. Nulkar has, without representing the opinion of the general public about the Bill, expressed his own individual convictions which are favourable to the heterodox reformers, and has thereby incurred public odium.

34. The Pratod (57), in its issue of the 19th January, regrets that Government should be about to pass the Bill in opposition to public opinion, and says that there is not the least doubt that Government will, by this interference with Hindu religion, hurt the feelings of the whole Hindu society.—Several other newspapers express their disapproval of the Bill and say that there is no necessity whatever for such a law. The Shubh Suchak (66) fears that if once Government break their promise of not interfering with religious matters by passing this unnecessary Bill, they will be tempted to go further and prohibit by a legislative measure idol-worship and ultimately to endanger Hindu religion, manners and customs, and to trample upon the people's liberty and rights.

35. In a communicated article, the Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 18th January, writes :—The Honourable Mr. Scoble has at last introduced a measure raising the age of consent from ten to twelve. The object is described to be two-fold : (1) the prevention of immature prostitution; (2) the prevention of premature cohabitation. Both objects are extremely praiseworthy, as they have direct and very important bearing on the physical and moral well-being of the nation. Indeed, as regards the first object there is no question even as regards the means fit to be employed to secure it. It is admitted on all hands that the increased protection contemplated to be afforded by law is the safest as well as the surest remedy for checking immature prostitution. Most delicate questions arise, however, when we look to the second object. There, too, the goodness of the object everybody admits. The question is whether it is desirable and safe for a foreign Government professing a different religion to interfere with the religious usages of a subject nation when it has generously but definitely promised not to do so. The Hindu religion is a bundle of written injunctions and unwritten customs, both having an equal force in the view of the people; indeed, in many cases the custom over-rides the sanctions of the written law, as our Judges and law-writers are but too well aware. Such being the case, the question arises whether the law, by raising the age of consent to twelve in the case of husbands with child-wives, would not interfere with the law and usage among the Hindus as it obtains at present. In practical matters where the consequences are serious, it is as futile to appeal to the past as to the future. Government must deal with the hard, the real, the substantive present, and leave the past and the future to historians and speculators. Such being the clear duty of a responsible legislature that professes to have the highest respect (we should have liked it to pay absolute respect) to the gracious Proclamation of 1858, will it not by passing the present Bill directly interfere with the practices of the Hindus? As you have ably pointed out on more occasions than one, it will in some cases, however few. It is a fact, however rare, that a few child-wives show signs of puberty before twelve, whatever the cause. It is also a fact that according to common usage the consummation ceremony generally takes place a few days after the appearance of the well-known signs. We know the ceremony may be deferred on our side, but the Hindu law does not prohibit its performance before any definite age, and the Hindu usage sanctions it. The case in Bengal is different. The only prohibition is that it is not to take place before the child-wife has begun to menstruate. Now suppose that a child-wife begins to menstruate before she has completed her twelfth year, and according to present usage the consummation ceremony takes place soon after, is the law going to haul up the parties concerned before the Magistrate? Suppose the husband is a minor, who is to be held responsible for the breach of the would-be law? The priest or the father? We trust these questions will be satisfactorily answered before the Bill passes into law. If the Government is bent upon improving our physical and moral well-being by law without interfering with our religion, then the only logical and safe course open to it, as far as we can see, is to mention no limit of age in the case of child-wives, but simply to declare that a husband cohabiting with his wife before she begins to menstruate will be considered to have committed an offence, whatever the age of the wife. If the Legislature adopts such a course it will have escaped all the difficulties, nay, will have gained its object in a higher degree than it has proposed to itself at present. Neither written law nor acknowledged usage allows any Hindu to cohabit with his wife before she has begun to show signs of maturity, and in very many cases maturity is deferred till the child-wife is past thirteen and in 95 cases out of 100 till she is at least past twelve. So that without trenching either upon Hindu law or Hindu usage, the age of consent will have in practice been extended to till after twelve if the course proposed be adopted. To secure this unexpected advantage and to escape from the difficulty of violating the solemn assurances contained in the Proclamation of 1858, the Legislature may well be asked to forego the contemplated good in the remaining five cases where puberty may take place before twelve. Accurately speaking, the evil then existing will not extend even to five cases out of a hundred, because, as we have already explained, it is not strictly obligatory upon any one, except in Bengal, to consummate his marriage as soon as his wife shows signs of puberty.

An ame dment in the Age of Consent Bill proposed.

In respectable households on our side the ceremony is often deferred to a certain period, and consequently by making such a just concession Government will have killed two birds with one stone. The age of consent and therefore of cohabitation will be raised to after twelve, and in not a few cases to thirteen, fourteen and even fifteen, and there will be no reasonable ground for complaint among the orthodox Hindus that the Mábáp Sarkár, in violation of its solemn promises, has interfered with their religion and their usages. Perhaps it may be objected to this proposal that it leaves the age of consent too indefinite and varying with individual cases for the safe working of a section in the Penal Code. We admit the charge is not altogether irrelevant, nay, it has some positive force. But even in the case of twelve years' limit, which has in addition the demerit of interfering with Hindu usage in cases however few, the same objection more or less applies. With the imperfect system, or rather no reliable system, of registration of births that exists at present, and will continue unimproved for years to come, what guarantee is there that a girl under twelve shall always be proved to be under twelve, or, in the case of malicious prosecution, a girl above twelve may not be proved to be under twelve? Such vagueness and indefiniteness is, if we may say so, inseparable from Indian law and procedure, at least for an indefinite period. Moreover, the honourable mover himself has admitted, and the President has confirmed, that in their view such legislation is intended, and actually operates, more as an educative agency than as a deterrent. That has been conceded to be the effect of the present ten years' limit. Will it not then be more politic as well more just to amend the Bill in the way we have indicated?

PART III.—Education.

This year's appointments to the Fellowships of the Bombay University commented upon.

36. The [illegible]ative Opinion (16), in its issue of the 22nd January, writes:—The list of new Fellows has just been published, and as the selection must have received the approval of both the Chancellor and the Vice-Chancellor, we must bow down to their united judgment. One main feature in the selections made, however, is the absence of the consideration of the question of seniority. Those who ought to have been honoured long ago do receive their due after a lapse of years, whilst those who are the happy owners of the honour could have well waited some time for the present conferment. It would thus appear that the act of selection is a combination made up of individual influence and Government favour. In this way the really high significance of a University Fellowship is altogether lost sight of, and the appointments are reduced to the status of play-things of the whims of those in whose gift the appointments may rest. Until the new University Bill is passed and the right of appointment is partially at least, if not wholly, transferred to the graduates of the University, the jobbery of these appointments will never cease. We shall not enter upon the invidious task of showing which of the new nominees might well have bided their time some time hence; we do congratulate them upon the happy wind-fall in their case. But we do appeal to the presiding authority of the University that in making these nominations it ought to take into consideration the educational claims conjoined with University standing of the nominees. There is every chance of the graduates of the Calcutta University being granted the privilege of election in the matter of University Fellowships, and we do not see why a similar privilege should not be conferred sooner upon our own graduates. We have every hope that the committee appointed to reconsider the University Bill will soon do the task assigned to them and send it up to Government through the Senate for final legislation.

37. The Bombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 19th January, observes that this year's nomination of 21 gentlemen and a lady as Fellows of the University of Bombay is very satisfactory, inasmuch as most of the nominees are graduates of some University or other and command respect in the society in which they move. The nomination of Miss Edith Pichey-Phipson, M.D., is most happy, since the appointment of a lady to a University Fellowship is the first of the kind. Government deserve to be congratulated upon this year's list of

Fellows. [The Jáme Jamshed (109), in its issue of the same date, expresses similar sentiments, but observes that room should have been made in this list for a few leading commercial gentlemen, particularly Mahomedans, and Hindu University graduates and other deserving gentlemen residing in Gujarát.]

A complaint against the Bombay University authorities in connection with the result of the last Matriculation Examination.

38. The Kaiser-i-Hind (87), in its issue of the 18th January, observes:—A student of the Sir Jamsetji Jijibhái Institution having been duly declared a successful candidate at the last Matriculation Examination joined St. Xavier's College for receiving higher education, but he has been subsequently informed by the University Registrar that he has failed to pass that examination. This is very hard on the poor student. This shows laxity and carelessness on the part of the University authorities in preparing examination results, and there can be no finality to them, for it is just possible that the names of some unsuccessful candidates might have crept amongst those of the successful ones, and vice versa. The University authorities should be more careful in future, and should, if necessary, declare the result of the Matriculation Examination a day or two after the appointed day in order to avoid such a blunder.

Working hours of Professors in a prominent College in Bombay and comments on them.

39. An "Old Elphinstonian," writing to the Native Opinion (16), in its issue of the 18th January, says:—At a time when so much interest is being taken in educational questions, an analysis of the working table of a prominent College in Bombay, recently famous for the notice published in your columns last month, will surely interest the public and afford them food for serious thought:—

Thirteen hours a week, that is, two days and a half bonâ fide work—at the rate of five hours a day—is the most that a Professor is supposed to do; and there is a gentleman who has to work for only 2 hours a week. Let the Director and those in charge of public money pity these hard-worked mortals! What have you to say to this? Do you not envy six hours' work a week? This table will also teach us where to look for some factors which contribute to swell the list of failures at the higher examinations.

The test of admission into the Grant Medical College and the Principal of that College.

40. The same newspaper writes:—The rejection by the University of the proposal for making P. E. the test of admission into the Grant Medical College was hailed as a boon by those who having passed the Matriculation Examination were desirous of prosecuting medical studies. But the poor fellows did not know that though the University had come to their rescue, they would have to count with Dr. Gray, the Principal of the College; for we are informed that this officer has lately begun to make a selection from the candidates for admission, admitting only those who satisfy him in an oral examination in English. It is said that for this he has obtained the sanction of the Director of Public Instruction. Last year as well as this year some candidates have been rejected. We ask if this is justifiable. The University lays down Matriculation as the test for admission. The Principal wills otherwise and has an examination of his own!

A request to Government to establish a High School in the Panch Mahála.

41. The Satyodaya (124), in its issue of the 22nd January, says that there is a sore necessity for establishing a High School in the Panch Mahála District, as the inhabitants are too poor to send their sons for their education to Ahmedabad or Surat. The paper observes that the matter was referred to by the municipal authorities at Godhra in their address to His Excellency Lord Harris at his recent visit to that place and that people are anxiously waiting for a favourable reply, and hopes that if the High School is established by Government it will receive the support of the Native Chiefs of the Rewa Kántha Agency.

Financial position of the Bombay Municipality and the way in which its budget is prepared and passed.

42. The Native Opinion (16), in its issue of the 18th January, writes:—Warned by the fate of the Poona Municipality, it is high time for the Bombay Corporation to set its own house in order. What with heavy defalcations, extravagant and reckless expenditure, increased taxation on the food of the poor and the contingency of still further enhancements in this and other branches looming in the not distant future, what with the readiness of the majority of the Corporation to do pooja to and obey those in power, the prospects are gloomy enough. Expenditure is overleaping the income of fifty-nine lakhs, and yet the Corporation does not perceive the danger that is unmistakably in store for it. But if the Corporation is blind, the rate-payers are beginning to open their eyes. This is indeed a very hopeful sign. The unique incident that was witnessed at the Corporation meeting on Thursday last, during the discussion on the fire brigade item, for which some four lakhs and a half are going to be spent, ought to give a rude awakening to our jo-hukum members of the Corporation. That the rate-payers had begun to watch the affairs of the municipality became apparent from the presence of an unusually large number of them in the hall since the commencement of the discussion on the budget. But nobody ever thought that they would so soon betray their pent-up feelings in such an emphatic manner as they did, when Dr. Cowasji Hormasji boastfully appealed to them for their support to the proposed expenditure, against the attacks of the small band of independent spirits like Mr. D. E. Wacha, Dr. Bhálchandra, Mr. K. M. Shroff and a few others. The rate-payers who could not bear all that was going on broke the etiquette and replied with an unanimous and emphatic "No, no," and might have said something else had not the President exercised his power of calling them to order. This ebullition of feeling on the part of the usually sleepy rate-payers must be taken note of. All this looks like the repetition of the municipal history of the times when the Bench of Justices mooted the reform question, disgusted with the administration of Mr. A. T. Crawford. We say deliberately that we are not far from such a repetition of history; for the municipality is fast getting into a similar muddle.

43. The Kaiser-i-Hind (87), in its issue of the 18th January, writes:—For the past three weeks a vigorous attempt has been made to trifle with the public spirit of the more independent members of the Bombay Municipal Corporation, and bring all manner of influence to bear on them that they may refrain from adopting at the budget meetings a line of action which they conscientiously consider to be imperatively urgent for the better security and conservation of municipal finance from heavy embarrassments in the near future. As we have more than once stated in these columns, the condition of the ordinary revenue and expenditure of the municipality is not of a most assuring character. We do not mean to say that the municipality is insolvent or on the brink of insolvency. But, at any rate, there are solid and substantial reasons for the belief that the finances are annually drifting into a condition which must sooner or later create an apprehension and lead to embarrassments, if not carefully surveyed at this juncture and properly kept in hand by those who have in the first instance to vote the annual supplies. Those who have carefully watched the estimates placed before the Corporation during the past five years cannot deny the force of the statement we have made. We do not speak without book when we assert that the municipal income, despite additional taxation, does not balance the annual expenditure, and that if a sort of surplus is shown in the municipal accounts it is a fictitious one and arrived at by a manipulation or cooking of accounts which, if practised in any department of the State, would be sharply criticised by enlightened public opinion and immediately put a stop to. It is notorious that certain whips, and also some far from disinterested members who hanker after official honours and official favours, have been going the round of Councillors, persuading them either to absent themselves from the Corporation or to vote on the estimates as prepared by the Municipal Commissioner and passed by that incompetent body known as the Standing Committee. The independence and public spirit of some of the reforming members have been rudely shocked at the manner in which these emissaries have been busying themselves in their discreditable mission. It is not a new tactic. It was sometimes adopted under a former régime, but so strong was the force of public opinion that those who adopted it took care how they went about their work. But the new danger which we refer to is this. The whipping has been lately carried on in a manner which is not only scandalous in itself, but highly mischievous to the growth of that independent civic spirit on which Bombay has prided herself for so many years. And the worst of it is that encouragement is being given (so it is said, with what truth we cannot yet say) to so scandalous and injurious a practice from the highest quarters. That the present administration is an administration of reactionaries is now being pretty well discerned. But it would be an evil day for Bombay, if the report we have heard be true (and for the sake of the reputation of the exalted authority we devoutly hope it may be officially contradicted) when a governor directly or indirectly attempts by his influence and authority to sway municipal finance and endeavour to repress that public spirit and independence which have been the chief characteristic of the municipal life of Bombay for nearly a quarter of a century past. We hold strong convictions on this subject and refrain for the present from expressing ourselves more at length, in the hope that the warning voice we have raised may have its salutary influence on those who thus attempt to trifle with municipal independence. This is the new danger which threatens our civic life, and if it is really to come to pass under the administration of His Excelleney Lord Harris, the sooner the loud and united protest of independent citizens is heard at a monster meeting to be specially convened for the purpose, the better. Bombay cannot tolerate such official officiousness in the local management of her affairs.

Comments on the Government resolution about the Poona Municipality.

44. The Sudhárak (19), in its issue of the 19th January, writes:—It is no part of our duty to defend or even condone real errors and irregularities on the part of the Municipal Corporation of Poona. Indeed, we should not have said a word against the Government or the Collector, if any such real irregularities had been pointed out and censured in a sympathetic spirit. But the letter of the Collector, as our readers will clearly see, is replete with insulting and insolent reflections, absolutely unworthy of the high position which Mr. East holds, and shows beyond the shadow of a doubt with what shameful bitterness, malignity and reckless disregard of truth or propriety that officer has been pursuing the Poona Municipality during the last few months. The Government resolution also, though worded in a more dignified manner, based as it is simply and solely on the representations, or rather the misrepresentations, contained in Mr. East's letter, is hardly less calculated to bring the cause of local self-government into contempt, and is a fine specimen of bad logic and worse one-sidedness. With amazing recklessness, hardly less culpable than wilful perversion, this resolution represents Mr. Náráyan Bhikáji Joglekar as a "representative of the rate-payers," while, as a matter of fact, he is only a Government nominee and might well be defied to get himself elected anywhere in Poona; and this little fact well illustrates with how much "careful consideration" the Government resolution has been drafted. The first five paragraphs of the resolution condemn the municipality for delegating undue powers to the managing committee, and with admirable logic the sixth and last paragraph lays down, as a remedy for this state of things, that within one month the municipality should submit to Government "definite and matured proposals" for the appointment of "a paid executive officer of established merit and capacity." The most serious feature of the resolution, however, is the readiness with which Government accepts as proved all the allegations of Mr. East against the municipality, without caring to learn or note what the municipal commissioners have to say to those allegations, although these gentlemen have a complete reply to almost all these. It is impossible not to condemn the hot and indecent haste with which the Government resolution has been given to the general public, presumably by some one interested in its publication; for there are no instructions at the bottom of the resolution to place it on the Editor's table, neither has it been officially communicated to the Poona Municipality. This last statement may appear startling, but it is absolutely and entirely correct. The only part of the resolution which has been communicated to the municipality is the last paragraph, which insists that "within one month from the date of these orders being communicated" proposals should be submitted embodying a scheme for the appointment of a paid executive officer "of established merit and capacity": and this practically means that something like an ultimatum has been sent to the municipality without telling that body what considerations have induced Government to send it. The unfairness of this haste, to use no stronger term, becomes all the more aggravated when it is remembered that the condemnation which has been pronounced has taken no account whatsoever of the defence of the accused party, a serious harm being thus done to the interests of that party in public estimation, as it is only natural that the material which alone has been authoritatively placed before the people should prejudice their minds against the municipality. But these considerations about the unfairness of the procedure adopted, important as they are, become secondary by the side of the allegations which the Government resolution assumes to be well founded and proved. We will deal with these allegations one by one. The most serious charge against the municipality endorsed by Government is that the general body has virtually abdicated the powers "which it should have jealously guarded" by allowing the managing committee to systematically transgress Rules 4 and 5, "which distinctly limit the power of the managing committee to sanction on its own responsibility ordinary works costing Rs. 200 and emergent works costing Rs. 500." It is a thousand pities that Government, which has in its service a highly paid Legal Remembrancer and whose Secretaries are presumably all men of great ability, should not be able to correctly interpret a rule sanctioned by itself, and thus consciously or unconsciously accept the mis-statement and mis-interpretation of one man as gospel truth. Any one who has a modicum of brains in his head will see from Rule 3, that the restriction limiting the power of the managing committee "to sanction on its own responsibility ordinary works costing Rs. 200" refers solely and exclusively to works for which there is no provision in the budget and the expenditure on which has therefore to be met out of the "reserve fund." The same is the case with regard to emergent works costing Rs. 500 or under. There is nothing surprising in the fact that Mr. Náráyan Bhikáji should not see this, for his knowledge of English is said to be of but a meagre character. But what is amazing is that first Mr. East and then the person who drafted the present resolution should also fail to see, or should choose not to see, this point, and thus confound such extraordinary works with ordinary works for which provision has been made in the budget. With regard to these latter, the practice has always been for the managing committee to apportion expenditure at its discretion within the budgeted amount. This practice may be safe or unsafe, convenient or inconvenient, but it has been in existence from the day on which the Poona Municipality was created down to the present moment, and if Government regarded it as objectionable it ought to have been challenged long ago. It is absurd to condemn the Poona Municipality of to-day for a practice which is of such long standing and which prevailed even in the days of the Collector-Presidents; and it is therefore hardly honest to regard this practice as an indication of the Poona Municipality "steadily going down-hill." The second allegation against the municipality is with regard to increased outlays of money by the School Board. Here, too, there can be no doubt that the Government resolution misinterprets the rules. It is true that Rule 14, which is a perfectly general rule, requires that any increase in the cost of a municipal establishment must receive the previous sanction of the Divisional Commissioner. But this rule was framed in 1874-75; whereas the rules of the School Board, framed and passed ten years later, only mention the Director of Public Instruction as the person whose previous sanction is necessary to any increased expenditure by a School Board. The absence of the Commissioner's name by the side of the Director of Public Instruction's in these rules justifies the presumption that at the time of passing these rules it was deemed sufficient to obtain the sanction of one Government officer. Assuming, however, for the sake of argument that the Government interpretation in this respect is more correct, we still fail to understand how Government thought itself justified in delivering itself of strong censure against the municipality for this difference of interpretation, especially as the Director of Public Instruction has always spoken in very high terms of the work of the School Board and has at times even himself suggested increased expenditure. We would make only one more remark in this connection, and it is this. The Collector's insinuation of possible dishonesty on the part of the Municipal Secretary with regard to the obtaining of the Director of Public Instruction's sanction is a wanton and unwarranted insult to that gentleman, and if Mr. East possess any gentlemanly feelings he should at once apologize for it. The third charge is that of paying exorbitant sums by way of compensation to owners of houses. Three cases are mentioned where the compensations paid are alleged to be exorbitant. It is surprising that Government should forget that the value of a site depends not only on its area, but also on its locality. In this connection, it is well to remember that there are decisions of the High Court which lay down the principle on which compensation is to be paid. This principle is that the owner is to receive the capitalized value of his rent at 6 per cent. per annum. The compensations paid by the municipality of Poona have all been based on this principle and have never exceeded the limit laid down by the High Court, and it is therefore impossible to fairly blame the municipality on this score. It might be added that in the days of the Collector-Presidents compensations much heavier than two of the three mentioned by Government when calculated by the square foot have been paid without protest or censure. Another charge still is with regard to the cost which the municipality had to bear in defending certain election suits. Now, in the first place, in the case of Bhámburda, it has been admitted both by the Collector and Government that it was necessary for the municipality to defend itself. In regard to the other suits, those who filed them chose to make the municipality the co-defendant, and it was thought necessary by the managing committee to engage counsel for its defence. The parties that were defendants had their own pleaders and bore their own costs. It may be that it was unnecessary for the municipality to engage counsel for its defence. If so, it was an error of judgment on the part of the managing committee. But it is absurd to speak of this as though the municipality had borne the cost of engaging counsel on behalf of the defendants themselves. The Collector and the Government are also wrong in stating that Mr. D. V. Gokhale, a pleader engaged by the municipality and also a member of the managing committee, voted his own fees, simply because he was present at a meeting where his fees were voted. We understand that he took no part in the proceedings when the question of his fees was under consideration. It might also be added that although the usual rate of his fees is Rs. 30 a day, he charged the municipality only Rs. 105 for 7 days, that is, at the rate of only Rs. 15. The fifth and last charge is in connection with the case of Vithu Báláji. Here we frankly admit that the municipality has not got as good and complete an answer as in the case of the other charges. Five years ago the contract to remove and appropriate the town-sweepings was given to this Vithu Balaji for a lump sum of Rs. 3,125. This Vithu is a mere menial in the house of a rich man of this city, called Ráma Bari, and the municipality made a mistake in giving the contract to Vithu, who, however, had Mr. Bari behind him. A letter about the contract taken from Vithu is among the papers of the municipality and legal opinion has been obtained that its validity will be admitted in a Court of law. Vithu paid no instalments, it is true, but the municipality found it impossible to change the contractor in the middle of the term, and besides it always hoped that Mr. Bari would make the payment some time or other. These are briefly the real facts of the present question of difference between the Poona Municipality and the Bombay Government. Let anybody read them with care, attention and impartiality, and we are confident that he will exonerate the municipality from all the blame which the Government has so unfairly and injudiciously heaped upon that body. With regard to Mr. East's statement that the Poona Municipality has been "steadily going down-hill," it is sufficient to refer to the high eulogium passed upon it by Lord Reay, with his knowledge of five years, on the eve of his departure. The reader might also be referred to a letter drawn up some time back by Mr. S. H. Chiplonkar, in which he clearly shows how, so far from going down-hill, the Poona Municipality has shown increased vitality, efficiency and progress in all directions during the last five years. The duty of our municipal commissioners—and especially of the elected portion of them—at this crisis is clear. Their duty is to the people and people alone, whose service they have voluntarily undertaken. They can afford to despise alike the smiles and the frowns of high-handed and narrow-minded officials, and even the censure of Government, based as it is on misrepresentation, which will, like "the idle wind that passeth by," affect them but little, if their consciences are clear and if the people have no fault to find with them. They should now, without unnecessary delay, address a full and dignified letter of explanation to Government, and then resign their seats and seek re-election to make it clear that they continue in the enjoyment of the unabated confidence of the people. An insult to men like Mr. Dorábji Padamji, the justly respected President of the municipality, is an insult to the people themselves, and it is the duty of all to show that they keenly feel it and bitterly resent it.

45. The Makrátta (4), in its issue of the 18th January, writes:—The Government of Bombay have, at last, after "a careful consideration of the correspondence," given their judgment on the allegations against the Poona Municipality that were inquired into by the local Collector. At the same time it should be remembered that there was no hearing given to the members of the municipality. The members might have had to say something in justification. But they are condemned unheard simply on the authority, we understand, of a letter written by the Collector of Poona. It is alleged that the municipal affairs have been going down-hill for some years past. But what did Lord Reay say at Poona on the eve of his retirement? He was at the head of the administration for five years, out of which come most of the complaints, and in reply to the address that was given by the municipality His Lordship said something very different. Moreover, the rate-payers of the city may be considered competent judges of what the municipal administration is. Have they ever, through petitions to Government or through public print, given vent to their expression of disgust arising from the down-hill fall of the municipality? If the Collector had been good enough to specify satisfactory cases showing the "downfall" we should have accepted his judgment. He has taken care to hunt after individual cases and has tried to make much of them. The municipal members will be the best persons to meet the allegations framed against individual members. We are not concerned with them. What we are concerned with is the wholesale condemnation of the whole municipal business. Where are the grounds which led the Government to form such a bad opinion of the Poona local administration? Is it the sanitation of the city that the Government have condemned? Is it the working of the city schools? Is it the lighting of the city? The Government are silent on all these points. The Collector and the Government point out, no doubt, some irregularity in the interpretation of the bye-laws. These are technical affairs, with which the body of the city fathers can best deal. We may be allowed to say, however, that the present body is strictly, and to a letter, following the lines that were laid down by the body working under the régime of the Collector-Presidents. Local self-government in India is yet nascent. The people, as a rule, have not been accustomed to look upon the success of local government as the great ideal of their life. They are in a state of transition, and it is very likely that they might commit errors not possible in a centralized administration. Lord Ripon said the same thing when the Local Self-government Bill was under discussion. That public spirit and enthusiasm which obtain in highly civilized countries will not be found at the beginning of an up-hill ascent. The Government officers were expected by Lord Ripon to help the administration by means of kind and sympathetic advice. Instead of all this, if they assume the position of jealous critics, the success of self-government, we are afraid, is doomed. Municipal administration is a foreign plant, and cannot take firm root in the Indian mind in a short space of nine or ten years. Irregularities in the application of technical rules are likely to occur here and there in affairs like these. What we have to see in such cases is whether irregularities are increasing or decreasing. If those in authority come to the conclusion that minor irregularities noticed by the Government betray want of public spirit then we must say that they are giving their verdict too soon. In spite of the "careful consideration" given to the subject by the Government, we think the whole thing has been disposed of in hot haste, and we are afraid the Government will have to reconsider their resolution when the municipal body send their own reply.

46. The Kesari (43), in its issue of the 20th January, remarks:—The circumstances which have led to the issue of the recent resolution of Government on the Poona Municipality, its nature and the uncalled-for suggestions made therein, if well scanned, will plainly show what an insulting decision Government have arrived at. The resolution tries to show that the municipal commissioners of Poona are wanting in judgment and the necessary ability to realize their own responsibility and to carry on municipal administration, and require instruction from a highly paid pedagogue. If the commissioners are found to be without any improvement from the instruction of the pedagogue, Government will not be backward in exercising the powers vested in them by law. It is a stigma on the British administrative policy that Government should have in this matter passed, without giving a hearing to the municipality, a resolution that is unjust, high-handed and insulting. In these disgraceful circumstances, the commissioners have no alternative but to resign their seats and leave Government to appoint a guiding executive officer. We think that the best course for them is to send a detailed representation to Government on the subject of the absurd charges brought against them by the Collector and a fellow commissioner and to sit quiet at home after throwing up the burden of the thankless public duties. The main suggestion made in the Government resolution cannot be brought into effect without amending the present Municipal Act. [The Shri Shiváji (65) of the 16th January also blames Government for having issued what it calls a one-sided resolution, and says that the appointment of a highly paid executive officer cannot mend matters, as he will only be a subordinate officer.]

47. The Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 19th January, observes:—The censure passed by the Bombay Government on the municipality of Poona must, rightly speaking, be said to be aimed at Lord Reay, for it is not even a year since His Lordship pronounced the administration of the municipality to be satisfactory; and if His Excellency Lord Harris says that it is bad, does it not mean that Lord Reay was quite wrong? Does not the Government resolution in question mean that Lord Reay made about eight months ago untrue statements? This is a novel way of declaring a past Governor to be dishonest When there is power in one's hand it is very easy for him to censure others. Though it is a long time since Government themselves issued a resolution stating that arrangements would be made to prevent percolation of water from the Khadakwásla canal, nothing has been done in the matter. Who is to censure Government for their negligence?

48. The Rást Goftár (88), in its issue of the 18th January, writes:—The severe censure passed by Government on the City Municipality of Poona is not severer than what was deserved by the apathetic tendency to let things well alone on the part of those "elected representatives of the people" whose sense of duty is roused into activity only a month or two before the time of their elections. Considering the strained relations existing, for some time past, between the Poona Corporation and the Government, not only of His Excellency Lord Harris but also of his predecessor, the important resolution just issued can take nobody by surprise, except, perhaps, those elected members of that body whose main activity consists in getting elected and then in going to sleep over their functions till the approach of the next general elections; and the impression left on one's mind after a careful perusal of the heavy bill of indictments set forth in the resolution is a sense of happy relief that the offending commissioners have not met with a stronger castigation than is administered to them in the official language of the document. Though Government have dealt gently with the Poona commissioners, it cannot be denied, if one were to read between the lines, that the thoughts occupying the mind of His Excellency the Governor in Council in drawing up this resolution indicate more serious acts of default and neglect than are comprised in the term "irregularity," which is certainly a mild expression to apply to them. The many instances enumerated in this resolution of wanton neglect in taking sanitary precautions, the marked discrepancies in the prices of land and in compensation for properties purchased for street improvement, and the ready payments voted by some municipal members to themselves, including the charges passed by them for their own election expenses and the fees which one member, a pleader, voted to himself, are acts deserving to be characterised by harsher terms than the word "irregularities," and the municipal commissioners of Poona should, if properly advised, thank Lord Harris for the very fair and mild measure of reproach which His Excellency has dealt out to them. When a liberal Governor like Lord Reay, with his almost radical instincts, was dissatisfied with the working of the Poona Municipality under its reformed constitution, the Brâhman commissioners of that city would not blame a conservative ruler like Lord Harris for treating them with such moderation as would hardly have been expected by them even from Lord Reay who was a great favourite of the Brâhmans. Whatever may be the outcome of this unfortunate dispute between Government and the Poona Municipality, it will be a sad commentary on the much-desired and wished-for success of local self-government in the mofussil; for if Poona, which is only next to Bombay in importance as a capital city, and which is even in advance of Bombay in political thought and activity, were to make such a sorry spectacle as regards Lord Ripon's great scheme of local self-government, what can be expected by way of success from the other mofussil towns which are of secondary importance when compared to Poona?

49. The Subodh Patrika (18), in its issue of the 18th January, writes:—The recent resolution of Government called forth by the conduct of the Poona Municipality is an instructive though sad commentary on the genuineness of the National Congress movement. That our neighboursof Poona, who areso keen about sending their representatives to the Legislative Councils, should show themselves so incapable of municipal government need not surprise those who can look beyond tall talk and big tamáshas, at the sorry reality which lies behind. What good can representative government do to men who voluntarily abdicate their rights of control to a small committee of their body, or to people who allow gross irregularities of procedure and waste of public money to prevail without protest of any kind on their part? The public of Poona whose money is so freely squandered, as well as their representatives whose right it is to control the expenditure, have shown equal indifference to the invasion of their rights, and it is the executive Government whose bureaucratic rule we wish to temper with the leaven of representative government that have to come forward to safeguard the interests of the rate-payers. The fact is that neither the classes represented, nor those who represent them, fully realise their position or their duties. People seem to think that power carries with it privileges, but no duties or responsibilities, and when once it centres itself in any individual or body, those subject to it have no business to interfere with its free exercise or prevent its abuse. Caution and diligence in the exercise of power, nay, even the requisites of ordinary decency, are alike unnecessary in the eyes of those entrusted with power, whilst those whose interest it is to call them to account never care to fasten them with responsibility for their actions. What scope can there be among such people for even the bare semblance of representative government? People only get such government as they deserve, and even the best devised of popular governments may fail where the people themselves have not yet learnt to keep a jealous watch on their rights against invasion by others.

50. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 18th January, writes:—Nothing could be more disheartening to friends of local self-government than the correspondence that has been recently published in connection with the affairs of the Poona Municipality and the resolution of the Government of Bombay thereon. Accepting the facts and statements as they occur in course of the correspondence, we must add that nothing could be more clear than that a case has been made out for the action taken by the Government. We should have preferred an explanation from the municipal body standing side by side with the Collector's letter as based on Mr. Joglekar's representations. The commissioners may yet submit such an explanation. But judging from experience, we fear the course reluctantly adopted by Government is the only one that could save the credit of this important municipality. It remains to be seen under what designation the proposed executive head is to work and with what powers. There is time for the commissioners to re-establish their credit, even with the aid and guidance of such an executive. We grieve over this culmination of irregularities, but are hardly surprised at it.

51. The Indu Prakásh (2), in its issue of the 19th January, writes:—The thunderbolt which was long in suspense has at last fallen upon the municipality of Poona. It is impossible to sympathize with a body of men who have shown such manifest disregard of duty as the Poona Municipality is convicted of. The Government does not measure its words. "Culpable neglect of rules as well as of ordinary financial precautions," "inefficiency of administration," "perfunctory preparation of the budget," "questionable proceedings" are some of the terms used in expressing the censure. The Collector's report is even more strongly expressed. If the cases mentioned in the resolution are true (and there is no reason to suppose that they are otherwise), it is not possible to say that the censure is not well deserved. In fact, we are surprised at the moderation of the Government. The Government refrains from putting the bludgeon clauses into force at once. "It is most reluctant to interfere with the free and spontaneous working of so important a municipality as that of Poona" and wishes to give it "a further opportunity of so amending its administration as to remove all grounds for reproach in the future." One reform the Government suggests, and with it we cordially agree. We have always thought it a great defect in the constitution of the mofussil municipalities that it makes each individual member an executive officer. The function of the members ought to be purely deliberative, and the executive power should be exercised by one individual under the guidance of a select body. The constitution of the Bombay municipality is an excellent model to follow. We are glad Government is endeavouring to follow the example in the case of the Poona Municipality. The Municipality is given one month to make its proposals of reform, and the rate-payers are also exhorted to consider seriously the subjects of the principles of election and the relation between the commissioners and the managing committee.

52. The Native Opinion (16), in its issue of the 18th January, writes:—We are sorry the Poona Municipality should have given grounds for such a censure as has been passed upon it. We have not the means to enter upon the merits of this unpleasant affair. There may be another side to the picture. But what we say is that our municipalities ought to be above suspicion. Local self-government is on its trial in this country. We are asking for further instalments of it. We are being opposed on the ground that we are not yet ripe for it. Unpleasant affairs like this are greedily laid hold of by our opponents, and therefore we say that our municipalities ought to manage their affairs so as to leave no scope for interference on the part of Government. Guided by our experience in Bombay, we are not however sure that the appointment of an executive officer, as has been proposed, will inaugurate a better order of things. It is the rate-payers and their representatives who must be vigilant, and alive to their interests and duties. There alone lies the true remedy.

Remarks in connection with the resignation of Mr. Kirloskar, President of the Sholápur Municipality.

53. The Kalpataru (39), in its issue of the 18th Januaay, approves of the conduct of Ráo Sáheb Sakhárám Rámchandra Kirloskar, President of the Sholápur Municipality, in sending in his resignation on account of the undue pressure alleged to have been brought to bear upon the municipal committee by the Collector on behalf of the secretary, when Mr. Kirloskar was aware of many cases prejudicial to his character, and remarks that mal-administration will have reached its highest point if Government accept the resignation of such an energetic, able and popular commissioner without enquiring into its cause.

A complaint against the Chairman of the Alibág Municipal Commission.

54. The Satya Sadan (63), in its issue of the 17th January, disapproves of the conduct of the Chairman of the Alibág Municipal Commission in trying to sever the connection of the editor of the paper with the commission by dismissing him from his place of secretary to that body, because he wrote in his paper from time to time complaining against the Chairman's views and mode of work and his inattention to important municipal matters.

The forthcoming revision survey of Malkápur Táluka in Berár.

1. The Pramod Sindhu (1), in its issue of the 16th January, disapproves of the proposed revision survey of the Malkápur Táluka, which, it says, is shortly to be followed by that of other tálukas, on the ground that the condition of the agriculturists is not such as can bear an increase in land revenue assessment which is sure to be made by Survey officers, whose tendency is generally towards enhancement of revenue, and requests Government to collect information about the real condition of the agriculturists in the different tálukas in Berár from independent sources instead of solely depending on their own officers before commencing the survey.

Remarks on the Age of Consent Bill.

2. The Berár Samáchár (3), in its issue of the 19th January, writes:—In the Viceregal Legislative Council Sir Andrew Scoble has introduced a Bill to raise the age of consent from ten to twelve. It is likely that the Bill will pass. We, too, are not much afraid of it. Had it been the forerunner of some other Bills that would affect our social institutions to the detriment of our honoured customs and privileges, we would have been the first to oppose the Bill. The Viceroy is quite explicit in disabusing the public mind of the wrong associations it will form with regard to this Bill, as it adopts one of the suggestions proposed through the Secretary of State for India by the English committee for Indian social reforms in London. Mr. Nulkar also has pointedly remarked that the widespread unpopularity of the Bill which removes a glaring defect of the law will be consequent on its being likely to be understood as a part and parcel of other proposals of social reformers that are intended to subvert more or less the social order of the Native community. The Bill is harmless though it tends to mould the marital relations to the proper standard. The opposition tactics in social reforms it is not our object to practise; but we would ask the Government to make the amendment as mild as possible. The new measure interferes with the marriage laws, but the interference will not be vividly felt as such, since people are of themselves paving the way for the reform and therefore are in a position to make the proposed age of consent as inoperative as the old one has been in its natural course. There are not two opinions as to the advisability of raising the age of consent. But there is a wide divergence as to the measures that should be adopted to prevent premature prostitution and immature cohabitation. As regards the first, the law should take the reform in its own hand, but as regards the second the social polity is an active agent to work out the desired effect. Interference on the part of Government is therefore a departure from its general policy, and implies a grave danger in the train of this Bill.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

The Government and the Indian National Congress.

1. The Kaiser-i-Hind (85), in its issue of the 25th January, writes:—The declaration of the Viceroy on the subject of the alleged prohibition of Government servants from attending meetings of the Indian National Congress as spectators is of a reassuring character. The Congress movement is considered perfectly legitimate and constitutional. The Government has no desire to fetter its progress, so long as the leaders conduct themselves constitutionally. It has not the remotest intention to disturb the movement. In the opinion of the Supreme Government, the Congress is guided by a body of leaders who may be compared to the "advanced Liberal" party in Europe. Though this recognition is flattering to the Congress, it must be here observed that the analogy is not correct. The Congress, we emphatically say, is not an organisation consisting of "advanced" Liberals. No doubt, the leaders are for reform, but the reform is of a most reasonable and modest character,—a reform in reference to which even the staunchest conservative in India, Native and Anglo-Indian, is agreed that it is ripe. The Congress has not proposed any radical reforms to warrant the Government in comparing its leading men to the Advanced Liberals of Europe. Moreover, the reforms, excepting the one for the Legislative Council, are reforms for the improvement of the administration. They are not reforms in the constitution of the Government. The Advanced Liberals in Europe more or less agitate for democratic forms of government. The Congress has never asked for such a government or even a representative government as is generally understood in Europe and America. Thus the analogy, in our opinion, is entirely inapplicable. The other distinct declaration of the Viceroy is that no Government servant may take part, directly or indirectly, in the proceedings of the Congress or any other meeting having for its object the ventilation of current politics. There is nothing to prevent Government servants from attending political meetings. In connection with this declaration the Viceroy now prescribes certain rules. So far the Congress can take no objection to them. All that the Congress asked for has now been made absolutely clear and there could now be no "misapprehension" on the subject. It may be therefore justly observed that the Congress has scored a triumph, and we thank His Excellency Lord Lansdowne for the eminently conciliatory and respectful tone in which he has expressed the views of his Government towards the great unconventional convention of the empire. The Congress, speaking between the lines, is now officially recognized as a force which it would be impossible for the Government to ignore. That is the distinct gain which the Elliott incident has obtained for the Congress.

2. The Bombay Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 27th January, expresses satisfaction with the communication of the Government of India to Mr. Hume regarding the attitude Government officials should adopt towards the Indian National Congress, however observing that the comparison made in the communication between the more advanced Liberal party in Europe and the Congress movement is not appropriate, inasmuch as the improvements desired by the latter are a few that are very moderate and there is no conservative party in India to represent these demands.

3. The Gujarát Darpan (81), in its issue of the 29th January, writes:—His Excellency Lord Lansdowne has done a wise and politic thing in recognising the Indian National Congress as a legitimate movement. This shows how the reserve which characterises Government in India can be profitably broken. Sir Charles Elliott says that it is a mistaken impression that Government is hostile to the Congress. The Viceroy, through his Private Secretary, observes that the original orders prohibiting Government servants from attending political meetings "arose out of a totally different matter, which had no special reference to the Congress movement, and were certainly not framed in a spirit of hostility to it." Then it is certain that Government is not hostile to the Congress movement. What have those who are afraid to join it on the ground that Government would be displeased, to say now? The police espionage of the last year which was so much talked about, the withdrawal of Native

State servants (who were British subjects) by the pressure brought to bear upon the States by the political officers, the disfavour which is generally shown to the Congress supporters by the officials, all go to vindicate the existence of restless spirits in the Congress camp. It is a matter for congratulation, therefore, that the Government of India has done the Congress justice in the end and protected its supporters at least from open interference and intimidation.

Memorial of the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha about the duty on salt.

4. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 23rd January, writes:—We congratulate the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha on the great wisdom it has shown in memorialising the Government of India on the subject of the duty on salt. The facts and figures with which the Sabha has supported its just and humane prayer are incontestable, and we are delighted to see even the Times of India admitting the strength of the case made out for the often-times promised but long-deferred concession. The surplus this year is estimated to come up to at least two krors, and Government, if so disposed, can well afford to redeem the parliamentary promise of Lord Cross. Will not the other Associations wake up in time and do their duty to themselves and to the poorer masses in the country? If they are in search of additional reasons why the duty be restored to its previous level before doing away with other taxation, they have it in the fact, so cleverly pointed out by the Calcutta Statesman, that it is the late rise in exchange which has, by crippling the trade of the country, made the struggle for existence for the poor more desperate than before. In simple justice, therefore, if for nothing else, the surplus derived from that rise ought to be applied to the relief of that party, the dumb millions and their cattle, who have suffered most through that rise.

5. The Gujaráti (82) and the Hindusthán (106), in their issues of the 25th January, observe that the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha has sent a weighty and well-reasoned representation to the Indian Government praying for a reduction in the enhanced duty on salt, and Government ought to grant the prayer. The Hindusthán adds that the statement recently published by Government in connection with the salt duty shows that the quantity of salt consumed during the first nine months of the current official year is less than what was consumed during the same period in any previous year, and that this reduction becomes striking when it is remembered that there has been a gradual increase in population.

Recent resolution of the Bombay Government on forest administration approved.

6. The Jáme Jamshed (107) of the 28th and the Bombay Samáchár (93) of the 29th January express hearty approval of the recent resolution of the Bombay Government defining the relations between revenue and forest officers and making clear its intentions as to the treatment of privileges accorded to villagers in forests, and observe that these orders will not fail to give satisfaction to the rayats if they are properly carried out by the forest officers.

Suggestions in connection with the Native Passenger Ships Commission.

7. In connection with the evidence that is being taken before the Native Passenger Ships Commission now sitting at Bombay, the Bombay Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 31st January, says:—Considering the pecuniary circumstances of deck passengers in general, no enhancement whatever should be made in the passage money, while space twelve square feet or six feet long by two feet broad should be reserved for every passenger as authorized by the existing law. As regards the passengers' luggage, it would not suit the passengers to leave it in charge of the ship's officers, and hence the best arrangement would be to have benches, six feet long by two feet, on which the passengers can accommodate themselves, keeping their luggage below their respective seats.

Native Passenger Ships Commission and the coasting steamers of Shepherd and Company.

8. The Native Opinion (16), in its issue of the 29th January, writes:—We have received a Maráthi correspondence relative to the inspection of one of the Shepherd Company's steamers in the harbour by some members of the Native Passenger Ships Commission now sitting in Bombay. The burden of the complaint is that the owners of the steamers, the proposed visit having got wind, kept everything in perfect order—cleanliness in the steamer, due allotment of passengers to each class or deck, a limited issue of tickets, and so forth. Had the owners had no previous knowledge of the proposed visit, the experience of the visiting members would have been, says the correspondent, quite different. If the object of the proposed inquiry, therefore, be a knowledge of the real state of things at the time of embarking, that knowledge or experience will never be obtained unless the Commission pay the steamers unexpected visits. The subject is of much importance both to passengers and the Commission, and the latter will not deem it unnecessary, we think, to pay to these steamers the sort of visits we propose.

A grievance of passengers by coasting steamers on the Konkan line and a suggestion in the matter.

9. The Jagan Mitrá (38), in its issue of the 26th January, says that since the ferry steamers of Shepherd and Company resumed their annual passenger traffic on the Konkan line in September last, not a day has passed on which some passengers at some of the ports on the line have not had to remain behind for want of accommodation on the steamers, requests that a kindly disposed officer of Government should, for the sake of public convenience, remove the difference, if there be any, existing between Government and the British India Steam Navigation Company, and recommends that the latter Company's steamers should be made to touch at all ports between Bombay and Mangalore as they do beyond the latter port.

Injustice alleged to have been done by the Special Settlement Officer to the people of a village in Saitavda Peta of the Ratnágiri District.

10. The Bakul (23), in its issue of the 25th January, says:—We have to remark that great injustice has been done in the Ratnágiri District in settling the rights of certain land-holders. There being no appeal on the orders of the Settlement Officer, the grievances of the poor people remain without redress. The rayats of a village in the Saitavda Peta have been complaining that their lands, which they have held as Dhára lands from time immemorial and which have been recognised as such by a Civil Court, have been classed as Khoti. But nobody cares to attend to this complaint. Even admitting that they were once Khoti lands, it is improper to class them now as Khoti, since they have ceased for the last hundred years to be treated as such. During this long time various transactions in connection with the lands in the village have taken place and in some cases the holdings have been sold by auction, and hence the present change in their classification entails much loss on the people and has led them to think that Special Settlement Officers are appointed by Government to encourage litigation for the sake of increasing their revenue. Due regard ought to have been paid to the law of limitation before issuing the orders in question. The people attach much importance to their rights in lands, and if these rights were to be thus set aside the poor people would have to forsake their homes and pass their days in wretchedness.

Swindling in Bombay and the local police and Magistracy.

11. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 26th January, writes:—The remarkable case of swindling in which Mr. Karsandás Chhabildás successfully brought to justice some clever swindlers has ended in the conviction and punishment of two of the persons caught and the discharge of the rest. The Magistrate, Mr. Richardson, convicted six out of the eight men placed before him and sentenced them each to two months' rigorous imprisonment. The High Court, thinking the sentence inadequate, called for the papers and enhanced the sentence against one to one year and another to six months, and let off the rest. The case thus brought to light is, we are told, not a solitary one. There is believed to be quite an organized system of crime widely prevalent in Bombay, which is causing a great scare. A band of sharpers is abroad, who are said to decoy persons on various pretences to their dens, and there despoil them of their belongings under threats. In one case an employé in a public office is alleged to have been duped into parting with Rs. 2,000 worth of ornaments. The legal machinery has been put in motion, one of the men has been arrested and let off on bail, and two are still at large. The case is sub-judice and we refrain from making any comments on it. But we think it is highly necessary that the police should take prompt steps to put down the system of organized swindling that seems to prevail, and to remove all cause of public disquiet.

Crime in Sátára District.

12. The Chitragupta (28), in its issue of the 29th January, says that owing to the inefficiency of the police and the extreme poverty of the rayats in the Sátára District, murders, assaults, thefts and other crimes occur frequently and that Government should take steps to remedy this state of things.

Part II.—Legislation.

Approval of the Age of Consent Bill.

13. The Kaiser-i-Hind (85), in its issue of the 25th January, writes:—It is indeed deplorable to observe Calcutta orthodoxy agitating itself in a most unreasonable manner on the question of the age of consent. That men of great intelligence and learning, of position and influence, even of philanthropy, should be so hopelessly led away by the questionable authority of their Shástras and refuse to be guided by the dictates of reason is indeed a matter of profound regret. What are the Shástras after all? Are they not products of human ingenuity and human reasoning? And what is religion itself? Stripped of all the mummery of rites and ceremonials which superstition, priest-craft and ignorance have superinduced, is it not a mere code of right conduct, a code of morals which the instincts of humanity prompt us to observe? May it then be asked whether it is a benefit to our common humanity, the humanity which boasts of all the progressive environments of ages past, that a physiological condition, admittedly injurious and even dangerous to life, should be perversely maintained—a condition which, according to the theory of the scientists, does not obtain adherence even among the lower animals endowed only with instinct? Really, it is to be hoped that the agitators will yet see the error of their ways and abandon opposition, which is not only degrading but highly revolting to the moral sense of the entire civilised world. In fact, while blindly adhering to what they fancy to be a religious belief, they are consciously violating the ordinances of Nature and of God, and so far they are committing a far greater sin than the sin supposed to arise from a violation of the precepts of the Shástras.

14. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 25th January, writes:—The cry has been set up in some quarters that the Government of India's Bill, proposing to raise the age of consent to twelve years, will do all manner of mischief without doing any good that could be conceived; and every power on earth and in heaven is invoked to avert the catastrophe. The Bengal agitation appears to us to be meaningless. When there was no trouble with the age fixed so low as at ten, how can there be any trouble when the age is shifted two years upwards? We have been assured that premature consummation is condemned by public opinion in all parts of India. Why, then, this hue and cry? Judged from the present clamour, the practice must be widespread in some parts. If so, the law proposed becomes all the more necessary, and its provisions need to be made all the more stringent. Such is the result of your assumption, ye Rishiputras, "who call upon Ráma Ráma with the tongue and trample live fish under the feet." In this case it is something infinitely more precious than fish. How low the country seems to have been brought by the custom of infant marriages! History will have to make a special record of this in letters of blood. The clamour is alleged to be due to religious sentiment. It is forgotten that many of those who raise the clamour stand very low in the estimation of Hindu religious sentiment, as also do the so-called authorities they cite. Our English law-makers may be reminded that the "Shástras" are not all of them religious codes endowed with the spirit of divine revelation. They are human products, dealing with legal, medical, sanitary and other topics, as some deal with the conduct of life in its manifold relations. In the matter under discussion the best Shástric authority is Sushruta, the medical law-giver; and he lays it down distinctly "that children born of parents who are respectively less than 25 and 16 years old are either still-born, or, if born alive, are weaklings." Sushruta and others fulminate against association of the sexes before 25 and 16, respectively, with all the warmth of righteous indignation. It is curious that none of the defenders of orthodox faith in Bengal quote the highest direct authority on the subject. We say it is altogether against religion, the laws of nature and common-sense that consummation should follow immediately after the first appearance of the menses at any age. Medical testimony, ancient and modern, European and Native, is overwhelming on this point. We know how this particular condition is superinduced in females by artificial means. Is that done according to Shástras? The natural condition never occurs in India, even in these degenerate days, before twelve years. Even if it did in some cases, it should not be considered normal, but diseased, and is not to be taken advantage of with wolfish avidity. The weight of authorities followed in most parts of India, and in most matters of religious importance, is dead against premature consummation. Even the much talked of garbhádhán ceremony is often delayed in deference to circumstances, sickness of one or both of the parties, absence, good sense of the parents, domestic differences, and so on. The Shástras prescribe a mild penance for such delay after the normal condition in the female has been established. In fact, the Shástras are as sensible and elastic in all such matters as could be wished. It is the class of monopolists that strain at a gnat, while swallowing a camel. If the worst came to the worst, why could not the most orthodox believer of them all be content with the trifling penance enjoined for delaying the garbhádhán ceremony, when every day of his life he has to violate more stringent rules of the Shástras without being called upon to do penance? It must be remembered, on the other hand, that just as the marriage ceremony is forced upon the hopeless victim, so also is the garbhádhán operation forced upon her now and again, especially where the husband is older than herself. There can be no religion in that. As a matter of fact, the weight of Shastric authorities is in favour of the marriage of girls after twelve years of age and consummation after sixteen. In exceptional cases the girl is allowed three years of grace, after attaining puberty, to find out a suitable husband for herself. And all this, be it remembered, is for the Bráhman; the other classes, that is, the bulk of the Hindu population, have a far wider latitude allowed them both in regard to marriage and to consummation. But, thanks to the influence of fashion and the wiles of the priestly classes, supported by the false patriotism of an enervated half-literate class, even these non-Bráhman classes are going in for both these evils, in the name of the Shástras! What the Government of India, however, are mainly concerned with is the physiological aspect of the question. With the Government of Bengal, we hold them partly responsible for the present state of affairs. As we have explained times out of number, if the British Indian Legislature had not fixed the age of consent originally at ten years, popular ideas would not have sunk so low as they now appear to have, judged by the demonstrations against the Bill. It is all the more the duty of Government, therefore, to carry through this partial measure of justice. If wild assertions about "religion" had been listened to, Government would never have put down Sati, infanticide, self-torture and other "religious" practices. The prohibition of violence on minor girls and girl-wives is a far more binding duty on the State than the prohibition, for instance, of self-torture. Talking of Shástras, we beg to repeat that it is the opponents of the present Bill who are the sinners. They have departed wantonly both from the spirit and the letter of the Shástras, that is, the original laws. In this matter Government are simply taking them a step back to the honourable position occupied by their forefathers, and thus enabling them to rise in the scale of nations, politically and otherwise. Let us implore public men on the other side to see the error of their ways in time. Such agitation as they seem bent upon will not only defeat its own object, but, as remarked by the sober Indu Prakásh and others, will stultify us in the eyes of our political friends in England. The risk is too heavy to run for a slight and temporary inconvenience even amongst those who favour premature consummation. To them we say again—Look before you leap.

15. The Jáme Jamshed (107), in its issue of the 26th January, says:—Most of the opposition that has been made to the Age of Consent Bill now before the Supreme Legislative Council comes from Bengal, while the rest of India is comparatively free from it. Few Hindus would approve of heartless cruelty being practised on girls of tender age, while the opposition elicited by the Bill is the result of the wrong impression received by that community, that if the Bill is allowed to be passed Government would be encouraged to interfere with Hindu social customs and usages, and the first proposition adopted at the public meeting held at Calcutta on Thursday last in opposition to the Bill was to the same effect. This wrong impression has been strengthened to some extent by the stress laid in his speech in the Supreme Legislative Council by His Excellency the Viceroy on the suggestions received from England in connection with the Bill. To allay this unadvised opposition it is desirable that Lord Lansdowne should repeat in distinct terms the assurance that the Bill has no connection whatever with Hindu social customs and usages, and that interference with them is not desired by Government.

16. The Bombay Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 27th January, contains a communication from one Manchchháshankar Jayashankar Dvivedi, saying :—An objection has been raised by the Honourable Sir Romesh Chandra Mitter against the Age of Consent Bill on the authority of Raghunandana, whose name is however not known in this part of the country and who appears to be a recent authority on Hindu religious law like Káshináth Pandit. Manu is the first Indian law-giver and is respected to this day throughout the whole country, and his injunction about marriage is that a girl is to marry after she has had thirty-six monthly courses. The law-givers have laid down that at the earliest a girl should be married at the age of sixteen and a boy at the age of twenty-five, and there is no text that the consummation of marriage should be made immediately after the first menstruation. The author of Sushruta (the greatest Indian medical authority) has laid down that consummation should be had after a girl is aged sixteen and a boy twenty-five. Very few persons now-a-days act in strict conformity with the Shástras. The foolish practice of child-marriages has led to young girls being ruined in health, some of them being maimed and others even dying from the injuries, but few Hindus would like to make such a confession. The Age of Consent Bill does not in the least infringe any portion of the Queen's Proclamation. However, it is not right to hold consummation of marriage after menstruation a crime punishable with a heavy term of imprisonment and to invest the police with authority in such cases, and the law should be quite clear to this effect.—The same paper, in its issue of the 30th January, notices the objections raised by the opponents of the Age of Consent Bill and answers them by arguments put forward by the Honourable Mr. Nulkar, Honourable Mr. Justice Telang and other leading Native gentlemen who have come forward in support of the Bill, and expresses its full approval of the measure.

17. The Phœnix (5), in its issue of the 24th January, writes :—It is a known fact that the marriage age of girls among the educated classes is perceptibly rising. Girls are married at twelve or thirteen years, and consummation does not necessarily follow when the first signs of puberty appear, nor does such failure entail any social or religious penalty. Among the highest caste in Bengal, the Kulin Bráhmans, girls remain unmarried sometimes till they become mature or even elderly women, and still such a signal breach of what is alleged to be a binding religious law is attended with no evil consequences. All that can be said is that the law to which so much importance is attached is of very limited application, and its breach has never been attended by any serious disabilities. Even for the appearance of the first signs of puberty the age of twelve is not at all a high average. Left to nature, the immense majority of Indian girls do not reach puberty before twelve. The opposition offered to the measure appears to be either of a superstitious or selfish character. People who would be the first to appeal to the ancient laws and customs of the Hindus in defence of existing institutions will never refer to those laws on the present question, because the testimony of the ancient books is against them. To them the fearful medical testimony laid before Government, as well as the petition from Indian women, are of no significance, so long as they can perpetuate a custom which has proved the bane of Hindu society.

18. The Gujarát Mitra (83), in its issue of the 25th January, writes :—We do not think it politically justifiable that a constitutional Government which acts under certain wise limitations and restrictions on its legitimate functions, should pass a particular measure affecting the social interests of the people, in spite of powerful and organized opposition. But a careful enquiry into the present case leads us to conclude that the opposition in question is led by a body of interested men, who generally talk a good deal, but say very little that is solid or substantial. We believe there can be no sight more loathsome than that a people whom we on this side of India have all along been giving credit for better learning and better understanding, should play the part of wilful oppositionists and advocate the integral retention of a section which has in thirty years' practice been found extremely mischievous to the vital interests of the tender sex. For, what shall we think of the faddists who have been harping on the loose string of their so-called Shastric injunctions? Will they not exercise their discretion a little and with the sound common sense of practical men like Mr. Nulkar arrive at a conciliatory understanding on the broad interests of humanity? They have to see that although consummation immediately after the attainment of puberty is sanctioned by the Shastras, the system practically comes in conflict with the growth and development of child-wives, as is now incontrovertibly established by eminent physiologists. It is scarcely needful to dwell on the permanent disastrous results accruing to the girl by cohabitation at the early age of ten. We would even go the length of saying that if the age of consent were still increased, say to thirteen, that too would not run counter to the wishes of sane people. The reactionists have to thank God that they are fortunately living in an age of intelligence and the consequent growth of public opinion.—The same paper, in its vernacular columns, advocates that the age of consent should be fixed at eleven instead of twelve years.

19. The Gujarát Darpan (81), in its issue of the 24th January, writes:—Even the moderate reform in the penal law of the country which Sir A. Scoble's Bill proposes has met with opposition from Calcutta. The whole of Bengal is in a turmoil of agitation consequent upon the wild cry that is raised against the Bill as interfering with the social customs of the Hindus. Even sedate Bombay has seen a meeting of the Bráhmans resolving to hold a public meeting to protest against the measure. In fact, this presidency should be the last to take such a step, for a custom that is already prevalent is to be given an authoritative sanction. Hardly a case occurs where cohabitation takes place before the girl has attained the age of twelve. So the Bill is not interference as some suppose. If we call this Bill by that name, we cannot help denominating the existing law limiting the age at ten interference also. Truly speaking, as far as we on this side of India are concerned, as the Bill proposes to deprive the police of the power of arresting without a warrant, it is a gain which should be credited to our account. Indeed, in some cases menstruation takes place before the age of twelve, but such instances are very few. The Select Committee which has been appointed at last Friday's meeting should be requested to add a special provision for such cases. The conventional limit of twelve should hold good in all cases, whereas the physical sign of menstruation before twelve should be regarded in the case of a wife to be one of puberty.

20. The Din Bandhu (10), in its issue of the 25th January, expresses its entire approval of the Age of Consent Bill as being likely to conduce to the improvement of the health of the future generations, and says that Government should pay no heed to the objections taken to the Bill by the Hindus who are in the habit of impeding every reform under false pretences, but should without hesitation pass it.—The Arunodaya (21) of the same date also approves of the Bill for the same reason, but fears that once allowed to interfere in religious matters Government might hereafter make further interference.—The Dnyán Prakásh (13) of the 29th January says that if the Bill is considered necessary under the present circumstances of the country, it should be passed at once without pausing to think whether it is consistent or otherwise with Hindu law, which supplies authorities either way.

21. The Samsher Bahádur (119), the Hindusthán (106) and the Hitechchhu (84) of Ahmedabad support the Bill for reasons already mentioned in papers of last and this week which are in favour of the measure. The Hitechchhu considers that the punishment for consummation of marriage before the age of consent prescribed in the Bill is very heavy and recommends that it ought to be reduced.

22. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 25th January, writes :—

Comments on the remarks made by His Excellency the Viceroy at the introduction of the Age of Consent Bill.

Disappointing as is the subject-matter of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's speech at the time of introducing the Age of Consent Bill, the spirit of it is even more disappointing. His Excellency seems to have looked at the movement for bettering the position of women in India barely enough to misapprehend some of its subjects. He is struck with the "tremendous" difficulties of the problem. No one has asked him to grapple with difficulties, tremendous or trifling, though for statesmen their difficulties are at times their opportunities. All that the Government of India have been requested to do is to recognise and gradually to withdraw from their own share of wrong-doing. We submit that the coercive process of the suit for "restitution of conjugal rights," in non-consensual marriages where there has been no institution of the marriage rite and where the ceremony is binding only on one party, is a piece of unjustifiable interference on the part of a professedly neutral Government, especially when the process has been abandoned in Christian Europe from which it was imported into India. There may be reasons why Government prefer to leave the matter to the discretion of the Courts, but we venture to think it is unjust in the highest degree to mix up cases of the kind referred to above with cases of real "restitution." At any rate, the Legislature ought to describe the suit by some other name. There is no "religious interference" in that. We submit also that the British Government have no business to sanction and enforce the consequence flowing from an infant marriage ceremony against the interests of the weaker of the two parties. This is the principle of our contention; and even if its application, after due notice, fails of the object in view, the British Government and the British nation will be freed, at any rate, of an odious responsibility. In another place Lord Lansdowne speaks of "the most absolutely binding" character of the marriage rites. "Most absolutely binding" on whom? If it were so on both parties, as it was intended to be, we would bow our head to it. But here it is 'binding' only on the girl, often young enough to be the husband's daughter. This husband can marry another girl to-morrow. But the wife has all the same to serve her lord and master while alive and to minister to his wants when dead. What becomes of "the most absolutely binding" character of the ceremony? We do not mean to say that the Government of India can re-adjust the marriage relations of the people as easily as they can re-adjust their salt-tax or income-tax. What we mean is that a statesman ought to look facts in the face, to admit them publicly, and to give to those concerned the benefit of his fatherly advice. Lord Lansdowne's speech, able and free-spoken as it is, is destitute of sympathy with the weakest and most helpless class of Her Majesty's subjects. It may not only discourage the aggrieved, but may actively encourage the aggressor. Let us hope that the Viceroy, actuated as he is by the best of intentions, will see the point we have ventured to urge upon his notice. We do not expect Government to concede at once all the demands made on behalf of the women of India, nor in this or that particular form. Nothing could be more gratifying to us than to see improvement in social matters effected from within. But we think we are justified in asking that, so far as Government themselves are concerned, the principles of righteousness and humanity, the principles on which the whole edifice of State stands so secure, shall not be discounted in obedience to exaggerated notions of expediency.

23. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 26th January, writes :—In support of the construction of the Proclamation propounded by our correspondent 'J' in our last number, the same writer further relies upon a later clause of the Proclamation in which Her Majesty says: "We will that, generally in framing and administering the law, due regard be paid to the ancient rights, usages and customs of India." 'J' goes on to comment on this clause as follows; Waiving any question as to whether the usage and custom now relied on is "ancient," which it certainly is not if traced back only to Raghunandana's time, the words italicised show that legislation was not intended by Her Majesty to be absolutely limited to the echoing of the rules of Hindu usage and custom. The language is very cautious—"generally". Hindu usage is to be respected. Again, it is not to be conclusive, only "due regard" is to be paid to it. If the customary rule is cruel, if it means torture and even death to individual women—rather, to minor girls,—then to treat the rule as binding is to do that which cannot by any manner of means be described as "due." Again, "regard be paid" cannot possibly mean more than "shall be properly taken into consideration." The usages and customs must be considered, but according to the obvious implication of the clause now under discussion, not to be slavishly accepted or enforced. If the usage or custom in the present case is considered, it can only be condemned by all reasonable and unbiassed men.

24. The Sudhárak (19), in its issue of the 26th January, publishes a note from the pen of Dr. R. G. Bhándárkar, setting forth texts from the Hindu Dharmashástras bearing on the controversy anent the Age of Consent Bill, and says:—At a time when almost every writer and every speaker against the proposed Bill is declaring from the housetops that the new measure would, if passed into law, interfere with a faithful observance of the injunction of our Shástras, the appearance of a very learned note from such a quarter cannot be too warmly welcomed. Dr. Bhándárkar needs no introduction at our hands. He is the best Sanskrit scholar of the modern type, at least on this side of India. A life of singular devotion to the study of Sanskrit, a scholarly eminence recognized alike in the East and the West, and an earnestness of purpose which it is impossible to surpass—these are surely adequate guarantees that the note will receive the most respectful consideration even at the hands of the opponents of Sir A. Scoble's Bill. It need not be added that the hands of the Government of India will be greatly strengthened, and the contention of the reform party about the nature of the injunctions of the Shástras well sustained, by Dr. Bhándárkar's note. Dr. Bhándárkar says:—The general results we arrive at as regards consummation of marriage are these: (1) That no text has been brought forward by Vijnáneshvara, Kamalákara, Nanda Pandita, Anantadeva, Maheshabhatta, Chandrachuda and Káshinátha Upádhyáya enjoining the Garbhádhána or consummation ceremony on the occasion of the first or any specific course, and that the Ashvaláyana Grihya Parishishta allows the liberty of performing it at any time. (2) That the texts which by some are construed as containing mandatory precepts as to intercourse on the occasion of a course, have been interpreted by others as invoking permissive precepts only. (3) That even if the precepts are regarded as mandatory, their operation must be delayed for one year in accordance with some Grihya Sutras and for three years in accordance with a text of Baudháyana. (4) That this delay is quite what one might expect in view of the facts that marriage can according to the Dharmashástra be deferred for three years after puberty, and that the rituals contained in the Grihya Sutra, especially that of Apastamba and Hiranyakeshi, presuppose a girl's having arrived at maturity. (5) That the consummation of marriage only when the girl has fully developed is quite in keeping with the spirit of the Rishi legislators, as the begetting of a son able to do credit to the father is their sole object, and its early consummation is entirely opposed to their spirit as the result of it is barrenness or weak and sickly children.

Exposition of the Shástric aspect of the Age of Consent Bill by Mahámahopádhyáya Bhimáchárya Zalkikar.

25. The Kesari (43), in its issue of the 27th January, publishes a communication in which Mahámahopádhyáya Bhimáchárya Zalkikar quotes authorities on Hindu law to show that according to Medhátithi, Govindaráj, Nanda Pandit, Kullukabhatta and other interpreters, a man who is not absent from home and is not suffering from a disease should have sexual intercourse with his wife after every monthly menstruation, and that according to the Nirnaya Sindhu a man may have intercourse with his wife even before the first appearance of the menses in case of necessity, and prays God that He may keep His Excellency the Viceroy, the protector of the religion of the Indian people, from raising the age of limit and thereby causing inconvenience to the people and making them commit sin by disobeying the religious injunction.

26. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 25th January, writes:—Sir Charles Elliott, the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, has laid it down that the Age of Consent Bill will be of little practical effect, except so far that it will strengthen the hands of reformers. Here then is the opinion of an experienced official of very high standing that the practical benefit of the change in the law will be almost nil. Surely, a question then arises, why should the Government of India go out of their way for such a useless piece of legislation? If they have gone in for it solely on account of the pressure brought upon them from England, we must say that, apart from the actual present effects, the precedent is fraught with great danger. If, on the other hand, they have put their hands to it with the object of strengthening the hands of the reformers, one is tempted to ask, who are these reformers, who want their hands to be strengthened by Government, and who presumably confess want of strength in themselves? There are reforms and reformers. Moreover, there are some so-called reformers who are in practice worse than the most orthodox; while there are some who are not given to blurting out in English mere boasts pure and simple, but who in practice do show a correct appreciation of and desire for a change for the better in our social customs. It is very difficult to understand what are the people whom Sir Charles Elliott classes as reformers. Is there any connotation in the term by which we can fix down one or many in our society at present? If we are to understand by it the so-called leaders of those who style themselves reformers, we find that most of them have never reduced into practice the least thing of what they have preached. These people, at all events most of them, simply talk in English glibly of reform, but dare not show to their English friends and admirers the inside of their own homes. They are as much slaves to infant marriage, enforced widowhood and what not, as others are. Even in matters that do not make any serious demand upon their independence and self-sacrifice, they have not the courage to act as they talk. At times it becomes a question of great perplexity for the on-lookers to make out what their real sentiments are. Calling very loudly against infant marriage, several of them have on losing their first wives got themselves married to girls below ten years of age. Very zealous advocates of widow-marriage as they show themselves to be, they have not only not married widows themselves, but have advised their friends not to marry widows, and thus caused them to turn away from a progressive step. Nor have they scrupled at marrying their daughters at a very early age or desisted from the unhappily common practice of taking big sums from the brides' fathers when they married their sons. Strange to say, in the houses of several advocates of reform, shaving of widows goes on as largely as in the houses of their orthodox brethren whom they never cease to decry. Are such men to be seriously called reformers merely because they advertise themselves to be such to their English friends, and should the Government of India indulge in experimental legislation for the sake of strengthening their hands? Alas for the day when these people put themselves forward as reformers! Instead of drawing their community towards reform they have filled them with disgust at the mere mention of the word. They have made a mockery of reform and have convinced the people of its uselessness by their own back-slidings. Besides this confession of futility, there is a very serious objection to the Bill, and that is, how is the age to be determined in cases that may come before the Courts? The law will add to perjury and lying. Whenever the question is raised, the accused will always assert that the wife has attained the age of consent. There are no birth registers in the country worth the name, and this will always be a question of balance between hard swearing. No doubt it will be said that this difficulty is not peculiar to this matter alone. Whenever an offence depends upon the question of the age of a particular person, the difficulty is sure to arise. But is it wise to multiply such cases? Besides, this particular case stands upon quite a different footing than the other cases. Again, there is the hardship of the law punishing the wife for the guilt of the husband. If a husband has intercourse with his wife before she is twelve years of age he will be sentenced to a long term of imprisonment, and simultaneously the wife is also subjected to great sufferings. The husband going to jail for a long term or his being transported involves in it the almost civil death of a Hindu wife. And what happiness could the pair enjoy after they meet again? The wife is bound indissolubly to the husband without any chance of freedom, and she cannot separate herself from the consequences to which the husband is subjected. Had she the liberty to separate herself from him it would have been quite a different matter. Then although care is taken in the Bill to prevent the police from being able to terrorise the people, still the chance of causeless annoyance is not appreciably reduced. Any neighbour who bears enmity might lodge a complaint for the satisfaction of giving trouble. And this is not a trouble that is similar in character to that brought on by complaints about other offences. In a complaint of this kind, the wife at all events will be dragged into Court, and we know what amount of signification such a threat means to a Hindu or to a Mahomedan. This is the more productive of mischief among the lower and ignorant classes of the community, among whom litigiousness for injuring one another is daily growing. We are afraid that notwithstanding all that has been said, the public has good grounds to say that this Bill is the outcome of pressure from England. Now, what do English people know of our domestic relations and the thousand and one intricacies they create? If once the impression goes abroad that English standards are to be applied to our domestic relations and that we are to be coerced by legislation into adopting them, we are afraid the cause of reform will suffer much harm. Why will not Government adopt the principle of self-help advocated by Mr. Spencer and content themselves in these matters with giving a legislative sanction to what customs the people might adopt for themselves?

27. The Bombay Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 28th January, contains a communication signed by one Dámodar Chhabárám Bhat opposing the Age of Consent Bill to the following effect:—The raising of the age of consent affects the Hindu religious law on the subject. Páráshara Dharma Shástra fixes the time of first menstruation at about the age of ten years and enjoins the marriage of a girl before the completion of that age. The same Shástra lays down that after first menstruation the consummation of the marriage should be effected. The latter injunction is given to serve as a protection against a young and inexperienced girl being misled while living separate from her husband. First menstruation as laid down by the Hindu Shástras is the proper time for consent, since it often happens that even on completing the age of twelve years a girl does not arrive at puberty, and in such cases it would be wrong to fix the age of consent at twelve and there is no better sign of puberty than menstruation. Again, if consummation of marriage is effected by a Hindu after first menstruation when it happens to be before the age of twelve years, as happens in some cases, the husband would be punished heavily under the proposed law. The heavy punishment proposed in the Bill should be provided in cases in which the death of the girl occurs from immature consummation, while for cases leading to no serious consequences simple imprisonment for a short time or a small fine should be prescribed. Most of the vernacular newspapers being in the hands of the so-called reformers, it would not be safe for Government to accept their views as the opinion of the millions who are opposed to the proposed law. Under these circumstances it would be advisable for Government not to interfere with the question of the age of consent between husband and wife, and leave the improvement of the subject to time and progress of education. [One Mánaklál Amritlál Dave repeats some of the above sentiments in a communication published in the Jáme Jamshed (107) of the 29th January.]

28. The Native Opinion (16), in its issue of the 29th January, observes:—It is natural that the Native press should express its strong disapproval of the Bill to enhance the age of consent, since the measure implies total disregard of an important assurance given by Her Majesty the Queen-Empress in the well-known Proclamation of 1858. There is nothing strange in this. The wonder is that some Anglo-Indian journals like the Calcutta Statesman, the Englishman, and others are remonstrating with Government in connection with the Bill. It is very creditable to the Statesman to admit that the Bill is calculated to interfere with the Hindu Shástras if it is enjoined by them that consummation of marriage should take place immediately after the first appearance of the menses. As regards the Englishman, though that paper has not thought of the religious aspect of the Bill, its remarks with reference to public opinion are literally true. It is not proper for Government to pass any law in opposition to public opinion. The mistake that Government are making seems to be due to the misrepresentation made by a few reformers. It will entail very injurious consequences on the Hindu society, and Government should take a lesson from the present agitation and rectify their error. The Civil and Military Gazette also admits that the Bill will afford malicious persons ample opportunities to harm the reputation of respectable families. Government ought to attend to the warning given by these influential Anglo-Indian journals though they might make light of the agitation of the indigenous newspapers, and our humble prayer to them is that they may defer the passing of the present dangerous Bill.

29. The Kesari (43), in its issue of the 27th January, congratulates the Native public on the effect of its agitation against legislative interference in social matters on the mind of His Excellency the Viceroy, in inducing him to discountenance nine out of the ten proposals made by Mr. Malabari and his Reform Committee, exhorts the public to take courage and manfully represent to Government its disapproval of the Honourable Mr. Scoble's Bill, and says: - Now that the Viceroy has declared his unwillingness to interfere with Hindu religion, the only thing that the public need do is to show that the proposed Bill is at variance with the injunctions of the Hindu Shástras. The question is "Is the Bill opposed to Hindu ceremonial law?" If the reply be in the negative, well and good. But if it be in the affirmative, the Bill must according to the Viceroy's declaration be set aside. The Honourable Mr. Scoble says that a legislative measure prohibiting consummation of marriage before the first appearance of the menses cannot interfere with religious injunctions and is right so far. But he has not explained why he has fixed the limit at twelve years. He has shown by statistics that six out of a hundred and twenty-seven girls show signs of puberty before the age of twelve. It is therefore clear that by obeying the directions of the Hindu religion in consummating marriage on the first appearance of the necessary physical condition, five per cent. of Hindus will have, if the proposed Bill be passed, to put up with transportation, and so far Hindu religion will be interfered with by the Bill. Our duty therefore is to draw the attention of Government to this fact. The best course for a foreign Government is not to meddle in religious matters, and looking to the assurance given by Her Majesty the Empress in the Proclamation of 1858 Government ought not to have taken the Bill in hand at all, or, at any rate, not to have proposed a limit contravening religious injunctions. It is our duty to raise an alarm and warn Government in due time against attempts at interference in social matters, and to point out that though Her Gracious Majesty affords us protection of life and property, for which we are highly thankful, and is the supreme authority in political matters, Her Majesty cannot claim same authority in matters religious. In brief, our contention is that the Bill, if passed as it is, will deal a blow to our religion and usages,

30. The Nagar Samáchár (49), in its issue of the 24th January, says that the legislative interference with the social and religious usages of the Hindus which the Honourable Mr. Scoble's Bill contemplates, will offend and irritate the feelings of the common people, wishes Government to give up the Bill, and advises the people to hold public meetings to protest against the measure and to declare their opinion boldly. [Several other papers express similar sentiments.]

31. The Rámdás (59), in its issue of the 24th January, says that the Hindus have implicit faith in their religion and will risk even their lives for its sake, as was amply proved by the mutiny of 1857, and that it is not desirable that the wrong idea which the masses of the people seem to have entertained about the Age of Consent Bill being only the first of the many steps intended by Government to be taken one after another to meddle with Hindu religion, should be allowed to grow stronger day by day.

32. The Shubh Suchak (65), in its issue of the 23rd January, expresses surprise at the Government of Lord Lansdowne bringing forward a Bill for raising the age of consent at the instance of a few social reformers like Mr. Malabari, while several more serious grievances of the people which have frequently been the subject of discussion in Parliament have remained unattended to, thinks that the Bill brought forward by the Honourable Mr. Scoble for the alleged protection of young girls is likely to make some of them lead a vicious life by ruining their worldly prospects in consequence of the conviction of their husbands on a charge of committing rape, and says that by trying under stringent orders from the Secretary of State for India to bring about social reform which must be effected by the people themselves, the Government of India is trying forcibly to pervert the Hindus from their religion.

33. The Bodh Sudhákar (9), in its issue of the 28th January, observes:— In bringing forward the Age of Consent Bill, Government have departed from their established practice of gauging public opinion before bringing forward a legislative Bill, and it is a matter for surprise throughout India that they should have forgotten a solemn promise given by Her Majesty the Queen in the Royal Proclamation of 1858. Her Majesty appears to have formed a strong opinion on the subject of social reform, and many educated ladies in England are said to be of the same opinion and are likely to prevail upon their husbands to bring the question in Parliament, if need be. Really, it is very unaccountable that so much sympathy should be shown in this particular matter of social reform when matters of greater importance calculated to better the condition of the people materially are quite neglected. That the social reformers should be more successful than the Indian National Congress is noteworthy. Our social usages have a bearing on our religion and it is very risky for Government to interfere with them needlessly in opposition to public opinion. In short, the Age of Consent Bill has perturbed the minds of the people very much and is looked upon as a very injurious piece of legislation, socially, morally and religiously, and it is strange that the Viceroy, who is well conversant with history and sound principles of politics, should have countenanced it.

34. The Praja Mat (117), the Gujaráti (82), the Nyáyadarshak (115), the Swadesh Bandhu (128), the Broach Mitrá (94), and the Snehá Sindhu (125) of this week advance against the Bill the same objections as have been put forward by several of their contemporaries who have opposed it last and this week, and say that the measure has spread much dissatisfaction among the masses.

An amendment proposed in the Age of Consent Bill.

35. The Native Opinion (16), in its issue of the 29th January, writes:— The feeling against the Age of Consent Bill is intense generally, and more particularly so in Bengal. In the latter presidency meetings are being held in every principal town and memorials sent up to the Viceroy against the Bill. Had the Bill contained a section making cohabitation with a girl who had reached her puberty even before twelve an exception, the Supreme Government would have taken away the sting from the whole agitation, and the country, we believe, would have quietly accepted the Bill without any clamour. For ourselves, we think the best solution of the difficulty may be found in making puberty the protected age limit, so that the principal object of the Bill may be more completely gained and the whole agitation put a stop to. The age of puberty amongst our people generally ranges between the ages of thirteen and fifteen, and if by making puberty the protected age-limit we can advance the protected age by one or two years more, we do not see why Government should hesitate to fix that limit. So long as there are no birth-registry offices amongst us, there will be great difficulty in exactly ascertaining the new age-limit of a girl, but it will not be so with puberty.

36. The Shri Shivájí (64), in its issue of the 23rd January, proposes that the Bill should be so amended as to provide that it would be no offence if a husband had intercourse with his wife after due performance of the garbhádhán ceremony, in the event of her showing signs of puberty before the age of twelve, and says that a provision like this will remove all the objections which are taken to the Bill on the score of religion.

Part III.—Education.

37. The Gujarát Darpan (81), in its issue of the 25th January, writes:—

Remarks on several points touched by the Vice-Chancellor of the Bombay University in his last Convocation address.

The remarks of the Vice-Chancellor about the Government Law School in connection with the recent changes made in the Law curriculum were well aimed and may bear fruit in a short time. The state of the school is far from satisfactory and it is a wonder that Government has not heeded the complaints made against it before. But the solution which is suggested—that of its being taken over by the University—will not be beneficial unless the University is prepared to enlarge its functions by being both a teaching and examining body. It is obligatory on Government that the school which yields so many public servants should be ably manned. Among the changes in prospect the Vice-Chancellor alluded to the change which was contemplated in connection with the Matriculation Examination. The examination is one which, to use his words, "looms so largely in the view of every school-boy, whether he intends to enter a college and to read for a degree or whether he wishes only to qualify for employment in the Government service." There can be no question about it that it is "a gigantic failure." It is true that many of those who enter a college find themselves unable to understand the lectures. It is also true that the Matriculation Examination "furnishes a very insufficient test of a knowledge of English" and that many go up there simply to see what an examination is like. But the proposal to abolish it and leave to the colleges themselves to hold their Matriculations will not be found acceptable. The standard would be very unequal. Boys would flock to that college where the examination was the easiest. It is not possible for our University to imitate Oxford and Cambridge, which are teaching Universities and are therefore able to directly control education. Here such is not the case. The abdication of the present function would mean even a greater deterioration in the sort of education that is given in our schools. The standard of English may be raised. The abolition of the oral examination was a great blunder. More of practical than theoretical knowledge may be required. Mr. Justice Birdwood did not attempt to discuss the merits of the controversy thus raised. From him we learn that the Syndicate, moved by weighty representations, has referred the whole question to a committee. The last point touched upon in the address was about the financial position of the University. Though the Bombay University is rich in scholarships, benefactions for other purposes, such as fellowships, on the English principle to enable students to prosecute their studies after taking degrees, are wanting. He put other objects of benevolence before the public, such as to make the University Library a good working library, and to form a University chest for the general purposes of the University which would make it independent. He also mooted the question of raising the examination fees and commended it to the attention of Mr. P. M. Mehta's Committee which is considering the whole question of examinations. The raising of the fees would be unpopular. Why should not the benevolent direct their attention towards the praiseworthy objects put before them by Mr. Justice Birdwood?

38. The Gujaráti (82), in its issue of the 25th January, observes:—We disapprove of the proposed abolition of the Matriculation Examination, and would suggest to the University authorities to make the necessary changes and raise the standard, and recommend Government to place high schools on a better footing, as insufficient knowledge of English is at present imparted in those institutions. In order to reduce the number of candidates at that examination it may be held twice or thrice a year. [The Kaiser-i-Hind (85) and the Gujarát Darpan (81), in their issues of the same date, disapprove of the proposal to enhance the examination fees, because they say that the present fees leave a fair surplus after deducting the expenses of the examinations, and that poor students will not be able to bear an increase.]

39. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 25th January, writes:—

Bombay municipal administration.

One of the staunchest advocates of the ratepayers' interests in the town of Bombay came to us the other day, asking if it was not time that "Government should be petitioned to take away the right of election" in regard to local self-government. The question took us rather aback, although we knew it had been raised before in several parts of India, and at times answered in the affirmative. We were hardly prepared for such a question in Bombay, and asked our friend to explain himself. Briefly stated, his view was that under the system in operation local self-government was "a farce," that the people were taxed heavier than before with a looser representation of their interests, and that the official and officialized element in the Municipal Corporation carried everything before it in the name of the public, while the few independent members were outvoted as if on principle. "We were better off," continued our interviewer, "when affairs were managed by the officials themselves. We had then the power of criticising their work. That power we have now lost. Our own men are made to go against our wishes and requirements by the official clique, and we are not in a position even to complain." Our friend cited the latest instance of municipal financing in the name of the people, and left very despondent after unburdening himself so far. Later the same day, his views were borne out by a circular with which we were favoured, quoting an article from a contemporary on the same subject, in which it was alleged that officials of the municipality used to send round whips to vote for avowedly unpopular measures and that influence was exerted from the highest quarters to obtain the support of the ratepayers' representatives for such measures. Now, there is no reason, we may say, to question the bonâ fides of the writer of this article or of the gentleman who interviewed us. Nor can we deny that there is a feeling abroad as to the undesirableness of maintaining a system of nominal self-government when practically the affairs of a municipality or local board are managed by officers of Government. We hold somewhat peculiar views on the subject. It must be remembered that the project of local self-government in India is still in its infancy, that those charged with its working will make mistakes till they grow accustomed to the business and till they have acquired the necessary amount of public spirit. A miscarriage here and there does not show, as some of our friends in other parts of India are eager enough to make out, that Lord Ripon acted as an enemy of the country by extending the scheme first inaugurated by Lord Mayo. The time was ripe for such extension, and if it has not answered all the expectations raised by sanguine partisans, we believe there are more factors than one to account for this very partial success. Though Lord Ripon's Government knew that the time had come for an extended trial, they were not unprepared for disappointingly slow results. India is peculiarly difficult for such experiments in municipal self-government. In the present case, if the officials use undue influence, why do the elected representatives of the ratepayers succumb to it? Are they the right men? Are all classes of the ratepaying community capable of electing the right men? What has been done to educate the ratepayers so far as to enable them to obtain a reasonable guarantee of good faith from those they return to the Municipal Corporation to safeguard their interests? Disinterested citizens have given up the task of organization in despair. The fact is there are clashing interests amongst ratepayers themselves, apart from ignorance, caste division and other obstacles. The official executive cannot fail to take advantage of this weakness in the ratepayers' camp, in the interests of what he deems to be progress. A dead-lock in the administration is undesirable, and so long as the executive takes legitimate steps to avert a dead-lock, we cannot hold him up to blame. The thing is done every day in Europe. Business must be gone through; wanton or ignorant obstruction must be discouraged. It is quite possible that the municipal executive may overdo the thing; but if the elected members of the Corporation are strong in intelligence and public spirit, they will resist undue pressure. On the other hand, the executive has to bear it in mind that with a house divided against itself it is not difficult to ride a coach and four through rules of procedure and even principles of administration. That this has been done off and on, admits of little doubt. We cannot shut our eyes to the fact of rapidly increasing expenditure on several departments without anything like increasing efficiency. This is a blot on our municipal administration, which those in charge cannot be too careful not to deepen by further extravagance. We sympathize with their desire for efficiency; but if they look at the matter calmly, with their own eyes, they will see that a good deal of additional outlay on some of the departments is a waste of resources and a premium on indolence and irresponsibility. It rests with the municipal executive to teach us wise economy, which is the first essential of success in the administration of public affairs. It may be very easy for officials to whip up a majority, but though we hold the johukums primarily to blame for helping them to such majority, we cannot help observing that the officials are open at times to the charge of abusing their position. As regards the Government of Bombay exercising undue influence on members of the Municipal Corporation, we have been able to see no ground whatever for the allegation. Government have the power of openly interfering in case of a dead-lock or of mismanagement; and they do exercise that power, however reluctantly. There is no reason, therefore, to believe that they would attempt that secretly which they have every right to do in open daylight. We are inclined to fear that such canards are set up by those who wish to shield their own weakness by making a scapegoat of the Government. It may be a mere excuse; and if so, it adds want of courage to the original sin of selfishness. The excuse may be all the more plausible, because it is made in regard to a Conservative Governor. But Conservative or Liberal, every head of an Indian administration knows that the success of local self-government is as much a relief to him as it can be a satisfaction to the most ardent well-wisher of progress in the country.

Comments on the recent resolution of the Bombay Government on the Poona Municipality.

40. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 25th January, writes:—The picture drawn in the resolution of Government of the working of the Poona Municipality is, if correct, really a dismal one. That the municipality of a city which so justly prides itself upon its intelligence and self-reliance, and which is rightly considered second in importance in the Bombay Presidency, should have exposed itself to such a thumping castigation at the hands of Government is a fact for which all the sincere friends of local self-government will feel deep sorrow. We have advisedly said, if the picture be true, because we are afraid that it is, if not quite, at least considerably, overdrawn. There have been rumours for some time past that the Poona Municipality was not in the good graces of Government or of its officials. During the régime of Lord Reay it had earned very good certificates about its work. But it was considered by some of the officials that Lord Reay was in fact overdoing the thing, and that he was patting on the back and spoiling the children who were already sufficiently spoilt. Indeed, the praise he bestowed in distinct terms upon the working of the Poona Municipality under its non-official and elected President was, it was said, too much for the equanimity of certain people who considered that Lord Reay was much too independent of his Secretaries and at times put forward his own opinions without due deference to those of his subordinates. Such kind treatment at the hands of the late Governor had already marked the municipality out for proper treatment, and the Poona public at all events expected that their city fathers would, whenever official opinion could be able to assert itself, be called heavily to account for the indulgence they had previously enjoyed. Side by side with this there was also the rumour that Government wanted to create an additional place for a civilian or for a favourite uncovenanted official, and that the present resolution is to some extent an outcome of that desire. Of course, we cannot for a moment give weight to such rumours. But that they did prevail for some time is a fact which we cannot ignore. Whatever the truth as to the first, as for the second everybody knows that the proposal was actually made to incorporate the city and the suburban municipalities and to appoint one executive officer at a high salary to look after the affairs of all of them, but that it fell through on account of a strong dissent from the Cantonment Committee. The measure suggested in the last paragraph of the Government resolution seems to lend some apparent support to the popular belief, and it is rather difficult to conceive why Government should have alighted on the expedient of appointing a paid executive officer of established merit and capacity to carry on the work of the Poona Municipality, and not on the less costly but presumably (on the authority of Mr. East) efficacious remedy of wresting from the municipality the privilege of having an elected President and putting in his place an official one. Mr. East was evidently greatly offended at the Poona Municipality for not at once falling down prostrate before him, suing for mercy. Had they done so he intimates that he would himself have settled the matter and not brought it to the notice of Government. But his dignity being offended, he considered that the Government should give a wigging to the municipality and bring them to a due sense of their subordinate position. In fact, from his own letter, paragraph 5, it can safely be inferred that it was not the gravity of the mal-administration that necessitated his reference to Government. He admits that he would have adequately dealt with it himself. But the fault of the municipality was not only that they mismanaged the affairs entrusted to them, but, what was more serious, they did not show an adequate consciousness of the dignity of a Collector. This offence was unpardonable and he could not even wait to give time to them for explanation. The Collector's letter, drafted in the heat of indignation, proved in its turn so powerful with the Government that they also did not apparently think that there was any reason to call upon the municipality to submit their explanation, and as a consequence the municipality have been condemned unheard. Was it, we may ask, considered by Government that the offence the municipality had given to the Collector disentitled them to that right of being heard in their own defence which is always enjoyed by the worst criminals in the land? Surely, we cannot but regret the haste in which the whole affair seems to have been managed. For aught we know, or for aught the Government itself knows, the municipality have probably a good defence on almost all the points of the charge. At all events there would have been no mistake committed if the Government, instead of deciding the matter ex parte, had given the accused a hearing. It is not for us "to defend a defaulting municipality." But it is our duty to point out that we cannot accept the verdict unless it is shown that it was delivered after hearing both the sides.

41. The Hitechchhu (84) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 29th January observes:—Several Collectors and other officers are opposed to the right of local self-government, because they think that they have lost the power they enjoyed before its concession, and try to bring into disrepute municipal administration in the mofussil. The Mehmadabad Municipality and several others were in this way deprived of the right of electing a certain number of commissioners when they declined to levy house-tax, and for some other flimsy reasons the Surat and Broach Municipalities were divested of their right of a non-official President. The Collector-Presidents at Broach and Surat have proved of little use to the municipalities owing to their absence from head-quarters in times of emergency, and the ratepayers' money is sometimes wasted by the commissioners to please the Collectors, as was recently done at Surat by building the Winchester Museum. The Ahmedabad Municipality and some others which closely follow the wishes of the Collector and Revenue Commissioner still enjoy the right of a non-official President. Under such circumstances it afforded us much satisfaction to see the Poona Municipality enjoying all the privileges of local self-government. If the allegations made against that body in a recent Government resolution be true, it certainly deserves the censure passed on it; but we do not approve of the proposal to appoint a paid executive officer, as that will put additional burden on the municipality while the officer will unnecessarily hamper the administration. It would be well to appoint an experienced auditor to check the municipal accounts periodically, to send statements of monthly income and expenditure for scrutiny by the Revenue Commissioner, and to hold the managing committee responsible for all illegal and unnecessary expenses sanctioned by it. It is strange that Government, who took no notice of enormous illegal expenses incurred in the time of Collector-Presidents, should have recently seen fit to issue such a slashing resolution for trifling amounts in the case of the Poona Municipality.

42. The Arunodaya (21), in its issue of the 25th January, writes:—At last an executive officer has been forced on the Poona Municipality and a Health Officer and an Executive Engineer will follow in his wake. No one can blame Government for their action, for they have only followed their usual course of taking advantage of the errors (if, indeed, they are nothing worse than errors) of the municipal commissioners. The irregularities of the members of the managing committee were culpable in the extreme, and the best reward for their services would be to hold a public meeting of the ratepayers and pass a vote of censure on them. They should have resigned their places ere now; but if they have not done so of their own accord, the pressure of public opinion will not be ineffectual. But, on the other hand, it may be asked what do Government mean by taking this step? Would the commissioners have persisted in their wrong path after it was pointed out to them by Government? Yet granting that they could not be trusted, what possible good would be done to the ratepayers by increasing the burden of an annual expenditure by 40,000 rupees? The grossest waste of municipal funds under the present circumstances could hardly approach this sum, and how Government ensure better economy by replacing Natives with Europeans can best be known to themselves. Irregularities in municipal administration arise mainly from two causes. One is a disregard of the status of the members in society, and the other is the want of check or supervision except that of Government. Men of straitened circumstances cannot properly discharge their duties. We have seen in an important municipality a member avoiding a meeting of the general committee for fear of his sáwkár's warrant being executed upon him. In the same municipality there is another member whose annual income is not more than 100 rupees; and these men are to pass budgets and estimates of thousands and thousands of rupees! This evil cannot be checked unless the operation of clause (d) of Section 16 of the Bombay Municipal Act of 1884 is considerably extended. The irregularities arising out of the second cause cannot be put a stop to until education has spread widely.

Government resolution on the shortcomings of th Poona Municipality and the comunication from Mr. D. V. Gokhale.

43. The Bombay Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 27th January, alludes to the letter addressed by Mr. D. V. Gokhale to the Bombay Gazette, published in its issue of the 26th idem, in which Mr. Gokhale defends himself against certain charges brought against him in a recent resolution of Government on the shortcomings of the Poona Municipality, observing that this communication gives quite a different aspect to the one contained in the resolution about certain acts of the municipality, and hence it is desirable that Government should order a fresh enquiry into the matter so that the public may know the actual facts.

Dacoities in the Basim District in Berár.

A correspondent, writing to the Varhád Samáchár (3) in its issue of the 26th January, says:—It is widely known that the Basim District in Berár is notorious for the crime of dacoity. Within a short time dacoities have been committed at Nurath, Moha, Nandura Izara, Pimpalgaon and Sheloo Bazar Kakarwadi. In addition to these offences a dacoity has recently occurred at Shirpur, and some robberies at Kuptee and cases of house-breaking at Korla. The rayats, particularly the money-lenders, have taken so much alarm that many of them have applied for licenses to use arms for their safety.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Death of Mr. Bradlaugh, M. P.

1. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 1st February, writes:—The mournful intelligence of the death of India's English champion, Mr. Charles Bradlaugh, will throw a gloom over the whole of India. By this time it must have been wired to every nook and corner of this country. Never before had any foreigner endeared himself so much to us as Mr. Bradlaugh had. His name had become a household word among us. We have had some distinguished English friends like the late lamented Messrs. Fawcett and Bright. They sympathised with us and fought our battles in the British Parliament and in England. But our latest champion had within the short space of three years worked so much for us that it was recognised on all hands that in him at last we had found a worthy supporter, whose indomitable will, unswerving purpose, untiring energy, extraordinary powers of endurance, high moral courage, great wisdom, and wonderful tact gave every promise of the success of our cause at no distant date. He was a host in himself. His lynx-eyed watchfulness and the pertinacity with which he heckled the Under Secretary of State for India with questions about Indian wrongs and grievances had made him a terror to the India Office, and Anglo-Indian officials had already begun to hesitate in their path of zubberdustism. What makes his loss at the present moment irreparable is the fact that his improved Indian Councils' Reform Bill now falls to the ground. This Bill, as we have pointed out already and as was explained by the President of the Indian National Congress at Calcutta, stood the greatest chance of passing. Especially in his hands the Bill was safe. We were all looking forward with great and joyous expectation to the passing of the Bill as the first great fruit of the Congress agitation. But alas! Once more has the truth of the old saying "Man proposes and God disposes" been brought home to us with bitter emphasis. The verdict in the O'Shea divorce case did not deal a more crushing blow to the Home Rule cause than the death of Mr. Bradlaugh does to our cause. What would add to the great grief occasioned by his death in this country is the mournful reflection that but for India Mr. Bradlaugh had been living now. He came to India last year to recoup his shattered health. But little rest did we allow him. With blind selfishness we pressed our interests and our grievances upon his attention. This occupied no mean part of his time and mind, and must have considerably taxed his energies during the whole of last year. Our feelings are, therefore, bound to be bitterly self-reproachful. The introduction of Lord Cross's Bill (Indian Councils' Reform), just as it stood last year, into the House of Commons at this juncture will bring home to us heavily the loss we have suffered in his death. Where shall we find now another like him? There are many others, no doubt, whose sympathies and hearts are as large as his, but they unfortunately do not possess the same sterling and indispensable qualities which essentially formed part of his character, and which fitted him eminently for the noble task he had undertaken. India will never forget the name of Charles Bradlaugh. May his soul rest in peace! [Almost all the Native newspapers have expressed deep regret at the untimely death of Mr. Bradlaugh, giving a brief sketch of his life and the services rendered by him to this country during the last three years.]

Government and the Indian National Congress.

2. The Gujaráti (82), in its issue of the 1st February, writes:—The assurance given by His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's Government as well as by Sir Charles Elliot that they are in no sense hostile to the Indian National Congress, that private persons, including pensioners, are free to join the movement, and that officers may attend the Congress meetings, will go far to remove the soreness of feeling and friction that were gradually manifesting themselves in the relations of the officials and the friends of the Congress. Government rightly insists that no official shall participate in any political movement, or prevail upon others to take part in it, or dissuade them from doing so. This attitude of neutrality which Government wish to maintain is certainly unexceptionable, and we are thankful to the Viceroy for acknowledging in a frank and generous spirit that the movement is a perfectly legitimate and constitutional one. The Viceroy's most remarkable speech on the Age of Consent Bill and the exposition of His Excellency's thoughtful views about the Congress have shown beyond the shadow of a doubt that he possesses the nobler qualities of a broad-minded and far-seeing ruler, without their being unhappily marred by the irascibility of his immediate eminent predecessor in office.

Rumoured retirement of the Honourable Sir Raymond West, Member of the Executive Council of His Excellency the Governor, Bombay, and a suggestion to appoint the Honourable Mr. Justice Birdwood in his place.

3. In alluding to the rumoured retirement of the Honourable Sir Raymond West from the Executive Council of the Bombay Government in April next, the Kaiser-i-Hind (85), in its issue of the 1st February, observes:—Mr. J. R. Naylor, Legal Remembrancer, is said to be the probable successor to Sir R. West, and we shall be glad to see him in the local Council when his turn comes. The Honourable Mr. Justice Birdwood has, however, better claims to the coming vacancy; besides, a Judge of the High Court is a higher officer than the Legal Remembrancer. His Excellency Lord Harris, who so very recently gave a proof of his appreciation of the literary abilities of the Honourable Mr. Justice Birdwood by nominating him as Vice-Chancellor of the Bombay University, ought to take the first opportunity to promote him to the Council.

Recent Government Resolution on the assessment and collection of the income-tax and remarks thereon.

4. While commenting on the recent Government Resolution on the assessment and collection of the income-tax in the Bombay Presidency during 1889-90, the Arunodaya (21), in its issue of the 1st February, says that it is a disgrace to the Natives anda stain on the British administration that in the face of the destruction of native arts and industries and in spite of the extreme poverty of the people, the Government should, simply because of an increase in the collections from this tax, come to the conclusion that the people have prospered, when, as a matter of fact, the augmentation in the amount collected means proportionate increase in the oppression practised by Mámlatdárs and increasing disregard for appeals against the Mámlatdárs' assessments.

The Income-tax Collector of Bombay and his Assistant praised for their administration of the Department during 1889-90.

5. The Jáme Jamshed (107), in its issue of the 2nd February, says:—The report of the Income-tax Department of the Bombay Presidency for 1889-90, just published, reminds us of the highly satisfactory manner in which the Income-tax Collector for the Bombay City and his Assistant have been doing their work since the formation of the Department. It is no easy task to assess incomes and make collections in this large city, in which are to be found congregated diverse races and creeds, and it is not a little surprising to find from the report for 1889-90 that there were during the year only 3 appeals against the Collector's assessment, and that in all the 3 cases the Collector's valuation was confirmed by the Income-tax Commissioner. The administration of their Department by Mr. Seervai, the Collector, and Mr. Coorlevala, his Assistant, has been throughout satisfactory to Government as well as to the public, and it is to be hoped that the services of these officers will be duly recognised by the authorities.

Approval of the Resolution recently issued by the Bombay Government on the relations between Revenue and Forest officers.

6. The Subodh Patrika (18), in its issue of the 1st February, writes:—We are glad to see from a Resolution of Government published this week that the administration of His Excellency Lord Harris has fully re-affirmed the principles which the Government of Lord Reay struggled hard to establish for regulating the relations between the forest and revenue officers. The due, but not absolute, subordination of the former to the latter has an important bearing on the enjoyment by the villagers of the permissible privileges accorded to them by Government in lieu of their old immemorial rights which have been confiscated by the Forest Act in the interests of the State. The present comprehensive orders therefore may be regarded as the final completion of the work of revision which was commenced by Lord Reay with the appointment of the Forest Commission of 1885. It was for the same principle that the Honourable

Mr. Nulkar fought hard as a member of that Commission and also in the Supreme Legislative Council on the occasion of the amendment of the Forest Act of 1878, and the present Resolution of Government must be a matter of satisfaction to him, as it is one of thankfulness on the part of the rayats towards him and still more towards the Government.

7. The Aruńodayá (21), in its issue of the 1st February, says:—From the Government Resolution on the relations between forest and revenue officers it seems that Government are aware of the oppression practised upon rayats by forest officers through folly and "excess of zeal" for increasing the forest revenue. Government are right in their conclusion that Collectors are likely to know more about the grievances and wants of the rayats than the forest officers, but are mistaken if they believe that the Collectors will comply with every just demand of the rayats. Although the decision of Government to communicate their orders to the people through village officers is good, it would be better if they were published through local newspapers also. This Resolution has been issued while Mr. Vidal, who was the President of the Forest Commission, is Acting Chief Secretary, and he deserves praise for it. We request him to continue to show the same earnest desire for the welfare of the rayats.

8. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 1st February, writes:—The Resolution of the Government of Bombay, directing that, subject to several restrictions, the Department of Forest may hold itself subordinate to the Revenue Department in administrative matters, is an important concession to the cry of popular grievance, and the past as well as the present administration of the presidency has earned the gratitude of the people by it. We must credit the Government of Lord Reay with the inauguration of this liberal policy, and that of Lord Harris with giving it practical effect. It may be in the memory of many that about the time Lord Reay came out as Governor of Bombay the feeling of the people against some of the A'bkári and Forest rules was very keen, and he had a good deal to do and undo in connection with those two great Departments of the State. His efforts to reform the working of the A'bkári Department were many; but as he had hardly time to overtake all the practical details, their effect proved to be inadequate. To afford a legitimate redress of forest grievances he appointed the Forest Commission, to some of whose recommendations he lent himself with characteristic good sense. And it augurs well for the reputation of the present Government to have developed the beneficial scheme of the late administration with a view to safeguard the rights and privileges of the rural population, and to supply local wants. The chief aim of the conservation of forests is an excellent one, especially for the wholesomeness of climatic effects on surrounding agriculture. But the Department, like others of later creation, has often to justify its existence by harsh means and to keep itself in evidence by a rigorous application of technical rules. The conservation and promotion of agricultural interests are the primary duties to which the Forest Department is invited to subordinate other aims. That "in its management of forests the ease and contentment of the people is an object of greater solicitude to Government than the realization of revenue," and that "Government have no desire to increase their forest revenue by the curtailment of conceded privileges or of local supply or by the levy of excessive charges for grass and other minor forest produce," are wise statements of the principles which ought always to regulate the operations of the Department. It is hard to discover any want of confidence in the Department by the Government re-affirming the guiding principle of former orders, that as a branch of the general administration the Forest Department ought to work under the authority of the Collector, who is the officer responsible for the executive management and well-being of his district. Whatever the usefulness of the Forest Department, it is not free from the evils of a department. The complaint is not groundless that an adherence by subordinates of the Department to the letter more than to the spirit of the forest regulations has been the cause of much annoyance to the district population. The villagers cannot but resent the curtailment of the supply of ráb, fire-wood, and grass for cattle or for thatching. In such a case, or in cases of difference of opinion, the Department will lose nothing by a reference to the Collector for final orders, while the object of the Government in giving relief to the villagers will not be frustrated through excess of official zeal. "Disregard of the rule," Government observe, "which requires all orders regarding privileges to be sent through the Collectors, has on more than one occasion caused hardship and inconvenience to forest villagers which might doubtless have been avoided, had the Collector been given the opportunity of objecting, which the rule itself provides." The Government, therefore, now look to the Collectors and Commissioners for rigid enforcement of all orders affecting the supply of local wants and the privileges of the people. The Resolution contemplates no encroachment on the freedom of the Department, nor confers new privileges either on the Collector or the villagers, but seems to aim at the safeguarding of all legitimate claims and interests, and a more scrupulous working of the original orders of Government in that regard.

9. The Kaiser-i-Hind (85), in its issue of the 1st February, writes:—After an embittered controversy, well-nigh extending over eight years, the local Government, thanks to the influence of Mr. Vidal, has once more seen the error of its ways and brought to book the recalcitrant Forest Department. It was indeed surprising how under two successive administrations that new-fangled off-shoot of the revenue branch of the State refused to bend itself in the direction which Commissioners and Collectors, with commendable zeal, sincerely desired for the better interests of the cultivating rayat. The Department, however, gained the ascendancy in spite of their efforts which, it is deplorable to observe, were never sufficiently and courageously backed up by the exalted authorities. Both Sir James Fergusson and Lord Reay were simply plastic moulds in the hands of the chief of the Forest Department. His transparent sophistries were allowed to sway their reasoning, fairly sound on other matters. Sir James had never a strong grip over the Revenue Secretaries, who, therefore, left no stone unturned to continually harass and annoy the cultivators in their ordinary agricultural operations by a series of Resolutions which they published from time to time with unremitting breath. The evil consequences arising from their arbitrary and unjustifiable edicts at last became too intolerable to be endured without a vigorous public remonstrance. Immemorial rights and communal usages were ruthlessly trampled upon, the rayats were restricted in their supply of rábi, every kind of harsh regulation conceivable by an irresponsible and tyrant autocracy was published and enforced with the hands of iron, destitution and misery were brought in many a rayat's home, and a spirit of sullen discontent, scarcely known before, warmly raged in the breasts of cultivators and owners of private forests alike throughout the presidency. Sir James' intellect, however, succumbed to the strength of the Secretariat argument and could do nothing to give redress to the people. The intellect of his successor most severely suffered from what may rightly be called a paralysis of forest literature. The deeper he dived into and saturated his mind with it the softer the mind grew, and therefore the less strong to impartially judge between the weak and oppressed rayat and the sturdy and tyrant forester. So the Resolutions of 8th April were a compromise, but a compromise of a most unsatisfactory character. Lord Reay had to leave these shores with a deep consciousness of his miserable failure, even after five years of experience, to do aught substantial to repair the rank injustice done to the rayat and the owner of private forests. In his replies to the farewell public addresses, he tried to confine himself to generalities and content himself with the conventional observation that he had endeavoured to do his best. Conscious of the barren results he had achieved in matters of forest, he was not able to congratulate himself on a single specific reform which could be said to have benefited the aggrieved. Nay, by an irony of fate, which dogged him to the last, the masterful Secretariat baulked him even while publishing his almost last public act. It had the audacity to suppress half-a-dozen paragraphs in reference to which the Secretary of State was questioned during the last Session of Parliament—questions which yet remain unanswered! Thus did the Forest Department, supported by the Secretariat, keep two well-meaning Governors at bay and prevent the rayats from obtaining any relief for their wrongs, though all along they had the sympathy of almost all the Collectors. But, strange to say, a change over the spirit of the Secretariat has lately manifested itself. A long Resolution has lately appeared, in which once more the relation which the forest officer should occupy with regard to the Collector is elaborately explained. Certain healthy rules are formulated, the substance of which is to impress on the Forest Department the performance of its own proper function, and its subordination, in all but forest conservancy pure and proper, to the Revenue Collector. This was the position prior to the usurpation of the authority of that officer by the forest official. The natural condition of matters being now restored and sundry wholesome and healthy regulations, in harmony with the recommendations of the Commission and conducive to the interests of the rayats and the private owner, being laid down, it is to be hoped the friction will now cease, and the cultivators will be allowed to carry on their agricultural operations without molestation or further deprivation of the privileges now prescribed. The operation of the new Resolution will have to be carefully watched. It would be premature to bless it, for it has been found, from experience of the past, that Secretariat Resolutions, suggestive of the most benevolent intentions, are often written only to remain as dead letters. They may as well be written in water. But, whatever the past history of forest administration may be, it is to be hoped that the Government has now turned over a new leaf. The mischief done has been irreparable. It could not be undone. But it serves as a warning and a beacon to future administrations. It also shows how an irresponsible oligarchy can override Governors, set at naught their benevolent intentions and even written Resolutions, and tyrannise over a voiceless people. It also shows how far these despots of the day have the power and the authority to bring untold mischief and hardship on thousands of Her Majesty's poorest subjects. Whoever may be the author of the present Resolution, he deserves the gratitude of the people. It is, however, earnestly to be hoped that, like his predecessors, His Excellency Lord Harris will not succumb to those influences which made them powerless for good in the matter of the forest administration of this presidency—an administration which is intimately and closely allied with the vital interests of agriculture and the agriculturists, but which has hitherto cast a stigma on the righteous character of British Indian administration.

The Native Passenger Ships' Commission and the grievances of passengers by coasting steamers.

10. The Gujaráti (82), in its issue of the 1st February, writes:—Now we have the Native Passenger Ships' Commission sitting in Bombay and taking a good deal of evidence. Without meaning to reflect in the least on the ability and experience of the Commissioners, we must say, and we think we are here echoing the opinion of the whole Native community, that the constitution of the Commission is open to objection in that there is not on it a single representative of the people in whose interests it was appointed by Government. The action of Government in this matter is simply unintelligible, and we must enter our strong protest against it. We do not know whether the labours of this Commission will result in providing passengers with greater accommodation and comfort and in their better treatment in future. The whole public press has been for years past appealing to Government for enforcing strict supervision over the coasting steamers with a view to put a stop to the intolerable overcrowding of passengers. Laws and regulations are nothing more than a dead letter, unless they are put into force by those whose duty it is to do so. But if these are remiss in their duties or are indulgent, rules are a mockery and a delusion. Similarly, the Native community has, through its acknowledged organs of public opinion, often asked for better latrine accommodation and for separate places for embarkation and disembarkation. Absence of any such arrangements causes very great inconvenience, and on some occasions the sufferings of passengers have only to be personally witnessed to be convinced of the urgent necessity of effecting radical reforms in the present system. The fares charged by the owners of coasting steamers for varying distances are also arbitrary, and during times of competition they are raised or lowered at their sweet will. We trust the Commissioners will consider the points we have touched above, and do their best to afford increased safety and convenience to the passengers. [The Satyavakta (121), in its issue of the 6th February, expresses similar sentiments, and adds that the Native passengers oftentimes do not find sufficient room to sit down comfortably, unless they give some douceur to the sailors on the steamer, and that their things are frequently stolen on account of the overcrowding, but no notice is taken of their complaints by the captain when informed of the occurrence. The paper recommends Government to remove these complaints, and to make a reduction in the present fare, which, it says, is exorbitant.]

11. The Bombay Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 4th February, says:—On 2nd February there was held a public meeting in the hall of Mulji Jethá's cloth market at Bombay in connection with the Native Passenger Ships' Commission that is now collecting evidence at Bombay. On that occasion several members of the meeting related their personal experiences of a sea voyage on a coasting steamer, and showed that the Native passengers were treated by the officers of these vessels not better than beasts, and that after the vessel had got quite clear of the port these officers ignored all law and did as they liked. Of the several complaints made on the occasion the one about overcrowding of passengers was the most important. The overcrowding was described to be so great that passengers could not on several occasions get sufficient room even to sit down; and sometimes some of the third class passengers were made to go and sit in the second class on account of want of room, and were forced to pay second class passage after the vessel had reached half way. This complaint is very serious, and the truth of it may be ascertained by employing the detective police. One of the reasons of overcrowding is that Native passengers are unwilling to part, even temporarily, with their luggage by making it over to the officers of the vessel, and the remedy suggested by us before, of providing benches, was approved of at the meeting, it being remarked at the same time that the passengers would be willing to pay a little more passage money for this convenience. Another complaint made at this meeting was about the absence of ladders to get in and out of the vessels, which caused not a little inconvenience and some risk to the limbs and lives of the passengers. The third item of complaint was about only one passage being kept for embarkation as well as disembarkation. This is done in disregard of the order of Government to keep two passages that was issued in connection with the complaint made by certain Native passengers that their women were insulted by the military sepoys who accompanied them on board a steamer belonging to the British India Steam Navigation Company. The fourth complaint related to latrines on the steamers not being convenient and clean. It is to be hoped, now that these complaints have been brought to the notice of Government, that no time will be lost to remove them. The same journal, in its issue of the 5th February, expresses a hope that due attention will be paid by the Commission to the suggestions made by some of the witnesses for increasing the number and kind of means for saving lives from accidents at sea, such as boats, buoys, &c., on a passenger steamer, and for having the different decks of a vessel at a sufficient height from each other, in case of vessels hereafter built, and allowing more space to passengers in the old steamers with low decks. [The Jáme Jamshed (107), in its issue of the 5th, and the Akhbáre Sodágar (91), in that of the 6th idem, express similar sentiments.]

Dr. Pollen on Hindu jurors.

12. The Arunodayá (21), in its issue of the 1st February, says:—The remark made by Dr. Pollen, the Sessions Judge of Belgaum, in his judgment in a case of murder recently tried before him and a jury, that it was not safe to depend upon the verdict returned by Hindu jurors in murder cases, casts a stain on the whole Hindu community. The Judge states that the Hindu jurors in the case intentionally returned a verdict of not guilty. It is desirable that the jurors should clear their conduct in respect of this charge. Granting that the jurors in the particular case returned a wrong verdict, what grounds has Dr. Pollen to assert that all Hindus are unfit to serve as jurors in murder cases? If a single Covenanted Civil Servant be proved to be corrupt, does it follow that all are so?

13. The Poona Vaibhav (53), in its issue of the 1st February, says:—On 28th ultimo, Dr. Bhálchandra Krishna Bhátavdekar went to the District Court at Thána to give evidence in a certain case, and a pleader in the Court asked a peon to give the Doctor a chair; but the District Judge, Mr. C. E. G. Crawford, ordered the peon to take away the chair, and thus showed disrespect to the Doctor. Dr. Bhátavdekar, besides being respected by most people, is a graduate, a Justice of the Peace, a member of the Bombay

Municipal Corporation, and a Fellow of the Bombay University, and it was not right on the part of the Judge to intentionally show disrespect to him by refusing to give him a chair after the Doctor himself had told him that he was provided with a chair even in the High Court. If Dr. Bhátavdekar did receive such treatment, what respect Europeans are likely to show to those who are a little inferior to the Doctor in social position can well be imagined. The disrespect shown to Dr. Bhátavdekar means disrespect to the whole Native community. Seeing that he may perhaps be blamed for his conduct in this matter, the District Judge is said to have written to the High Court to issue definite orders as to what persons are entitled to a chair. But this is a trick to escape reproach in the present case. [The Arunodayá (21), in its issue of the 1st February, also refers to the incident, and says that Dr. Bhátavdekar himself asked the Judge to allow him a chair after he was sworn in, adding that he had appeared to give evidence as an expert; but the Judge said that it did not matter whether he had appeared as an expert or as an ordinary witness. It looks somewhat strange, adds the paper, that Dr. Bhátavdekar should have himself asked for a chair. It would have been better if the Judge had been a little more polite in refusing the request of the Doctor.]

14. The Surya Prakásh (88), in its issue of the 31st January, observes:—

A request to Government to provide for the successful candidates at the University School Final Examination.

At the institution of the University School Final Examination, Government issued a Resolution to the effect that the successful candidates would be given preference over others in Government service, but this promise does not seem to have been fulfilled, and if proper steps are not taken in time, students will be discouraged from preparing for that examination. It is not right that Government should employ European pensioners on State Railways, and we should recommend them to employ the successful candidates at the University School Final Examination in their place and also in the Police Department. Government should also publish annual statements of the successful candidates who have been employed in the State service during the year.

15. The Káthiáwár Times (3), in its issue of the 31st January, writes:—

Highway robberies at Rájkot and the rumours about the permanent removal of the Native Regiment and a squadron of Cavalry stationed there.

Of late there have been frequent highway robberies, and we draw the attention of the Political Agent to them. It is currently reported and generally believed that these robberies are due to the persistent and widespread rumour that the Native Regiment and the squadron of Cavalry stationed here are shortly to be permanently removed. As yet we know not how far credence can be given to this rumour, but we are sure that it will be a very short-sighted policy on the part of Government to remove what little garrison we have for Káthiáwár. It is to be hoped that the Political Agent will impress upon the Government the necessity of retaining the garrison, unless they are prepared to see outlawry and highway robbery breaking out once more.

Part II.—Legislation.

16. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 2nd February, writes:—The twelve years' limit has been chosen by the Government, as we have said, as the lowest safe limit, in deference to the somewhat abnormal conditions of our social opinions and practices. To go below the twelve years' limit is to revolt against nature. These physical considerations are, to our mind, supreme, and will be recognised to be decisive of the issue by all thoughtful persons. Those of our countrymen who are ranging themselves against the Bill would, we venture to think, admit them to be equally decisive, but for certain religious scruples which are warping their judgment. 16. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 2nd February, writes:—The twelve years' limit has been chosen by the Government, as we have said, as the lowest safe limit, in deference to the somewhat abnormal conditions of our social opinions and practices. To go below the twelve years' limit is to revolt against nature. These physical considerations are, to our mind, supreme, and will be recognised to be decisive of the issue by all thoughtful persons. Those of our countrymen who are ranging themselves against the Bill would, we venture to think, admit them to be equally decisive, but for certain religious scruples which are warping their judgment. As regards the religious scruples, let us first ask our educated countrymen to consider if they honestly believe them. According to the interpretation which is the basis of these scruples, the Shástras hold out the terrors of the sin of infanticide for those who break the supposed rule. Now let us ask our friends to candidly say if they think in their heart of hearts that any such sin is real. Let no thoughts of pseudo-patriotism weigh upon their minds, and induce them to appear to believe a creed which from conviction they have discarded. We, for our part, cannot bring ourselves to believe that our educated countrymen have sincere faith in the religious rule or its penalties. Moreover, whatever the religious rule, its observance, on this side of India at least, has been more a matter of routine than of faith. We admit there is a practice of consummating marriage on the first occurrence of the well-known event, but it is not done as a matter of religious necessity, and its postponement, which is not uncommon, is not viewed as involving any spiritual consequences. Whatever the genuineness or otherwise of the feeling in Bengal, there is no feeling here, that we are aware of, that the Shástra lays down an imperative rule as regards consummation. If, therefore, in any possible cases the notable event may occur before the twelfth year, and the consummation may have to be put off for a few months under the proposed law, no violence will be done to popular feeling. In this view the present cry seems to us to be entirely make-believe or spurious. Further, is the supposed rule, in point of fact, so imperative as it is alleged to be? Two of our best modern Sanskrit scholars have given an exposition of the texts, which shows that the principle of the Bill is in entire harmony with them, and that it is supported by the opinions of some of our ancient writers of great authority. We do not wish to enter here into an examination of the texts, as it has been already done by abler hands. Suffice it for us to say that our people will do well to follow the interpretation there suggested. It is in strict obedience to the Shástric rules of interpretation, is based on express authority, and is in full consonance with the spirit of the actual practice prevailing among our people. The more rigid rule propounded by the scholars of the old school lands us into a perfect mess, and makes our position thoroughly ridiculous. The depths of absurdity to which the old interpreters will carry us is illustrated by the letter of one of our local Mahámahopádhyáyas to a vernacular contemporary, who declares cohabitation permissible even with a girl of eight! Surely, nothing will bring our religion into contempt so much as these pronouncements of the so-called defenders of the religion. That a religion should demand the subjection of girls of eight, ten or twelve to the sensual embraces of a man at the first occurrence of a certain physical condition, however tender her age, seems to us highly preposterous. We refuse to believe anything so stupid of our religion. The cry of "Religion in danger" raised in Bengal will recoil on the heads of those who are making it, because those who affirm such wicked barbarities of our religion are its worst enemies. As we have said, we decline to accept that our religion gives any such ordinances as are contended for. Assuming it does, we say the British legislature in its superior wisdom is fully competent to set them aside. The appeal to the Proclamation is the veriest bunkum. The question was fully considered in these columns in our issue of the 19th ultimo by our correspondent J., whom our readers will readily identify with one of our foremost citizens. There is no need to travel over the same ground here. It is enough to say that there is no such imperative rule, and that, supposing the rule to be so imperative, it is not one which within the terms of the Proclamation the Government is bound to respect. What grieves us most is that educated writers in the press should indulge in the most irrational and wild forebodings about the Bill. One writer says:—"Out of every 126 girls, 6 girls attain their conventional puberty before the age of 12. The husbands of these 6 girls must suffer transportation for life." Why must they? Could they not afford to wait for a few months to complete the statutory period? Let us ask these wild writers to consider what effect their present irrational proceeding is likely to have on British public opinion. We have warned them that it will cost them dear as regards their cherished political aspirations. That our warning was not groundless is shown by Mr. Hume's letter to a Calcutta contemporary. Another of our best English friends, to whom the educated Natives of this presidency are accustomed to look up with respect, writes to a Native gentleman here in similar terms. The words of these English friends of ours convey a most serious warning. Let us once more implore our educated countrymen to discard the championship of a cause which it is impossible they can believe. We do not think their clients, the ignorant orthodox masses, call for such championship. They are doing the greatest disservice to themselves, to their clients, and to the whole country by working themselves up into a mad fury over a proposal which is quite elementary as regards medical science and self-evident in the eyes of all unprejudiced observers. If no considerations of reason or consistency will prevail with them, let us appeal to them on the ground of their material interests, and warn them that the course they are pursuing is full of peril for those very interests they so dearly prize.

Disapproval of the agitation against the Age of Consent Bill on religious grounds.

17. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 1st February, writes:—The Government of India have doubtless seen through the hollowness of the cry raised in Bengal in connection with their Bill to protect immature girls from violence. The little group of Rájás and Mahárájás are no more to be recognised as exponents of religion than as custodians of ruling power. They are jamindárs or landholders raised to affluence by the permanent settlement established in the time of Lord Cornwallis. Of religious importance these gentlemen have none. They are not Bráhmans; very far, indeed, from being Bráhmans. As a matter of fact, even the Bráhmans of Bengal generally are not much thought of by Bráhmans of Bombay and elsewhere, not being over-particular in the observance of Shástric rules which they quote verbally when it suits their purpose. Let it be remembered that the present cry is a repetition of the clamour raised by the same class at the time Lord Dufferin passed the Bengal Jamindári Bill: it is a cry from monopolists. Lord Dufferin was firm, and the cry availed nothing. When the jamindárs saw that resistance was useless, they went about their business quietly, and the Bengal Tenancy Bill has since been a law of the land. "Much cry and little wool"—that is a characteristic of the so-called orthodox opinion of Bengal. The pity is that these Rájás and Mahárájás do not see how in the present case they drag the whole country down with their crude notions of Raghunandan and Garbhádhána. As to Raghunandan, his authority is hardly ever recognised outside Bengal; indeed, his very name is unknown to most of us. As to Garbhádhána, if consummation is necessary immediately after the first appearance of the menses, why is it delayed in thousands of cases? Messrs. Bhándárkar, Ránade and Telang, Bráhmans of the highest position, declare that consummation can be delayed indefinitely. This they declare on the authorities of the Shástras. Again, if the Garbhádhána ceremony is so urgently necessary, how is it that the Rajputs have formally deferred the marriage ceremony itself, which precedes the Garbhádhána ceremony, in the case of girls till 16? Surely, the jamindárs of Bengal and their followers do not pretend to higher sanctity than the Rajputs. That the Garbhádhána ceremony is not urgently necessary at any particular juncture is shown by the Shástras, which make wise provisions in case of illness, absence, quarrels, &c. What, then, becomes of the "inviolable rite"? It is distressing to see the methods employed by some of the opponents of the Bill. To say that Government are going to make marriage in India dependent on their own will and pleasure; that they are going to let loose the police upon the privacies of life; that the religion of the Hindus is going to be entirely upset;—this is too much even for the most bigoted of social monopolists who have read Sir Andrew Scoble's speech while introducing the Bill. As we have observed before, Government are prepared for reasonable arguments. But when religion is being utilized to such questionable purposes, no Government, worthy of the name, can listen to the criticism. The Hindu religion is far nobler than its Bengáli interpreters of the day would have us believe. And, even if their interpretation were to be believed, the principle of Government enunciated by Mr. Nulkar, the Bráhman Member of Council, must triumph, namely, that humanity and good conscience cannot be trampled upon in the name of "religion."

18. The Bakul (23), in its issue of the 1st February, says:—The Age of Consent Bill will surely interfere a little with our religious customs, but this we should put up with, as we do with several other evils. If the Honourable Sir Romesh Chandra Mitra and others, who oppose the Bill on religious grounds, had real respect for their religion, they should have asked Government to fix puberty as the time of consent as regards husbands and a certain age-limit in the case of others. If the question comes to a compromise between the supporters and the opponents of the Bill, the paper would recommend 14 or 15 as the age-limit in the case of strangers, and the first sign of puberty, whatever be the age at which it appears, in the case of the husband.

19. The Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 5th February, says that Professor Tilak has been inconsistent with himself in criticising the Honourable Mr. Telang, inasmuch as he had, a few months back, expressed his readiness to go even against the Shástras to carry out necessary social reforms, provided a certain number of people joined him in doing this; and that the interference of the Age of Consent Bill with religion, if so it really is, is not a new departure, as the religion has been, so to say, interfered with when the limit was fixed at ten.

20. The Pársi Tikákar (116), in its issue of the 1st February, observes:—The Hindus have degraded themselves in the estimation of non-Hindus by protesting against the Bill, which has been brought forward by Government in the interests of the Native communities, and have shown that they are not deserving of the right of local self-government, and that the National Congress is a mere farce. It is not fair that the Hindus should under the plea of religion find fault with a benign Government having the best of motives.

21. A correspondent of the Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 2nd February, says that the authorities from the Shástras brought forward by men like Mahámahopádhyáya Bhimáchárya Zalkikar and meetings like the one held in Tulsibág at Poona show that the object which the Government have in view will not be gained by passing the Age of Consent Bill, and that the Government should prepare themselves to face a little more opposition and pass a law prohibiting marriage before the age of 12 instead of the present Bill.

Approval of the Age of Consent Bill by the Marátha community in Bombay.

22. The Din Bandhu (10), in its issue of the 1st February, writes:—A numerously attended meeting of the Marátha community was held at Vadgádi, Bombay, on last Wednesday evening to consider the Age of Consent Bill. Mr. Mádhavráo Rághoji Rokade presided, and after the object of the meeting was fully explained, a resolution expressing their sympathy with and support to the Bill was unanimously passed, and it was resolved to petition Government to push on the measure in the interests of humanity. It undoubtedly redounds very much to the credit of our backward classes and to the Marátha promptness and decision of character that while some of the old orthodox Shástris on the one hand and modern Hindu scholars on the other are wasting their time and energy in carrying on a theological warfare on the religious aspect of the Bill, the Maráthás have at one sweep cut the Gordian knot at their last mass meeting. The masses admit the principle that social reform must grow from within, but owing to want of moral stamina in our educated classes, who ought to take the lead, and owing to the strong hold the priesthood still has upon our people, the growth of social reform from within is an impossibility. In the present controversy what strikes us as ridiculously absurd is the stand the anti-Bill party takes, while discussing the Bill, upon the tottering basis of ancient and out-of-date Shástras. No man in his sound senses will ever deny the fact that society is progressive all over the world, and that social customs, traditions and laws must change as the society changes. What wisdom is there, then, in appealing to laws and traditions which were framed five thousand years ago for altogether a different society to that of the present? As far as we know, the Shástras are kept up more in their breach than in their observance by those very high-class men who now seem anxious to preserve their religion from legal interference! We ought to be satisfied with the reasons and object of the Bill as explained by its honourable mover, and we ought to be more than satisfied with the fair manner in which His Excellency the Viceroy has dealt with this question in his excellent speech.

Alleged misin terpretation of Hindu Shástras by Dr. Bhándárkar and the Honourable Mr. Justice Telang.

23. The Mahratta (4), in its issue of the 1st February, writes:—The eminent Sanskrit scholar of the province, Dr. Bhándárkar, and the learned Native Judge of the High Court, Mr. Telang, have already come forward to say that the Shástras do not enjoin Garbhádhána ceremony to be performed on the very first occurrence of puberty, and that, further, the duty is not obligatory. The Bill, therefore, cannot and will not interfere with the Shástras. Such a bold declaration from such learned scholars would naturally make one pause before he contradicts them. But the consciousness that truth is on our side and our sense of duty to the public make us bold to challenge the position taken by these Pandits of the day, and we propose to show, with due respect to the learned gentlemen, that neither of them has rightly grasped the meaning of the Shástras. Mr. Telang's treatment of the subject is comparatively superficial, and we shall, therefore, take for refutation the views enunciated in the elaborate note of Dr. Bhándárkar. After citing several passages from the Shrutis and Smritis in support of its contention that Dr. Bhándárkar and the Honourable Mr. Telang have misinterpreted the Shástras the paper continues:—The Garbhádhána ceremony must be performed on the first attainment of the well-known physical condition. And this is the view of all the great Hindu divines. Turn to any Smriti or a Nibandha, you have the marriage first enjoined and then the injunction that "the husband should have intercourse on the attainment of the physical condition." And logic, express texts of Sutra and Smriti, the unanimous opinion of Hindu divines, and, above all, that great modifier of Hindu law, the custom of the land—all declare against Dr. Bhándárkar's view, and interpret the phrase to mean "the first attainment of the physical condition." The very foundation of Dr. Bhándárkar's theory being thus destroyed, it is needless to examine his other statements. Of course, the Shástras allow exceptions in certain cases, as when the husband is ill, imprisoned, out on a travel, and so on, but these exceptions themselves prove the rule, and the present Bill cannot but interfere with it. Much has also been made of the recommendatory and obligatory precepts; but, as pointed out by Mr. Tilak in his letter, the meaning of these phrases is utterly misunderstood, and the doctrine once accepted would by parity of reasoning lead to very dangerous results. The words used in our Shástras to denote the two kinds of ceremonies are kámya and nitya, which are rendered into English by 'recommendatory' and 'obligatory,' but kámya in its connotation entirely differs from 'recommendatory.' By kámya our writers mean nothing more than that a certain act has not purely spiritual benefit in view, but that it serves the purpose of regulating the relation between man and man. Under this head are included such ceremonies as marriage, inheritance and others, and no one dare say that interference with these is justifiable, as according to Hindu notions all of them have more or less religious significance. All that kámya means, therefore, is that a man may choose to lead a life of celebacy in preference to marriage, and so on. But we cannot understand how Government can come in, and interfere in these cases. We have, however, exceeded our limits, and have consequently to postpone a detailed consideration of this second point to another issue if necessary. We cannot, however, conclude without remarking that the reformers have been ill-advised to take their stand on these strained interpretations of Sanskrit texts.

Dr. R. G. Bhándárkar and the Honourable Mr. Justice Telang censured for holding views in favour of the Age of Consent Bill.

24. The Kesari (43), in its issue of the 3rd February, adduces a number of texts from the Hindu Shástras to show that Dr. Bhándárkar's interpretation of the law on the subject of the consummation of marriage is incorrect, and that as soon as a married girl shows signs of puberty, no matter what her age be, the marriage must, according to all authorities on Hindu law, be consummated, and says that it is unbecoming for a gentleman of Dr. Bhándárkar's learning and respect for the old Hindu sages to try to misconstrue the texts of the spiritual law. The same paper expresses dissatisfaction also with the opinions of the Honourable Mr. Justice Telang on the subject, and remarks that if the Royal Proclamation of 1858 and the assurances of non-interference given therein be interpreted in the manner adopted by the Honourable Judge, there will be no difficulty in prohibiting by law idolatry, infant marriage and some other practices sanctioned by Hindu law. About the voluntary neglect of some of the injunctions of the Shástras by the Hindus alleged by Justice Telang, the paper observes that though the allegation is true, it is none the less true that a prohibition to obey them imposed by law is sure to be felt as an encroachment on personal liberty and is consequently likely to be resented. In conclusion, the paper regrets that an educated gentleman like Mr. Justice Telang should speak so irreverently of the injunctions of the Shástras as he has done, and should recommend their violation, saying that the penance prescribed for such violation being so light as the payment of a two-anna piece to a Bráhman and suspension of breath by holding the nose by the hand for a couple of minutes, may be done without much difficulty.

25. The Native Opinion (16), in its issue of the 5th February, also takes Dr. Bhándárkar and the Honourable Mr. Justice Telang to task for the opinions they have given in support of the Age of Consent Bill, saying that Dr. Bhándárkar has, in his exposition of the Hindu law, disregarded the contexts of the texts he has quoted, and attached a far-fetched meaning to his quotations simply for the purpose of showing them to be favourable to the opinions of the so-called reformers. To Mr. Justice Telang the paper is, however, very severe and sarcastic, and says that in supporting the cause he has espoused, he has by means of the eloquence and sophistic reasoning he has acquired by his practice as a barrister, and which, after sitting on the Bench for a year or a year and a half, he has not yet forgotten, outdone Dr. Bhándárkar and supported the legislationists with spurious and ingenious arguments. With regard to Mr. Justice Telang's argument that the command of the sovereign must, according to the Hindu law, be respected, the paper asks if the British Government is prepared to recognise the injunction of Manu, the Hindu lawgiver, that the sovereign deserves to be punished if he be oppressive or unjust, and says that if the Government is so prepared, the people will not at all object to legislation in social matters. In conclusion, the paper gives vent to much resentment at the argument of Mr. Justice Telang about removing all religious difficulty by undergoing the prescribed penance of suspending breath for a few minutes, or giving two annas to a Bráhman, and says that as idolatry is not enjoined to every Hindu, all the idolatrous temples in the country should be razed to the ground and the people should be converted to Christianity at one sweep, as there would be no fear of excommunication when the whole community are turned Christians. Whatever the handful of reformers like Mr. Telang may do, the people are satisfied, adds the paper, that Government will not produce discontent among the masses to please the reformers.

Warning to the people against the reformers and their leading.

26. The same paper delivers a long discourse on the doings of the reformers in opposition to the dictates of the Hindu Shástras regarding the worship of God, observance of caste distinctions, eating, drinking and such other matters and on the inconsistency of their behaviour with their professions of independence and freedom of thought and action, and warns the people to beware of trusting the reformers and following in their footsteps, saying that though they may be learned in secular knowledge they are not worthy of being listened to in matters religious, that in their attempts to advance the cause of what they call social reform they are actuated by selfish motives of acquiring credit with the Europeans for holding advanced views and of gaining titles or promotion in service, and that if the people agree to the Age of Consent Bill brought before the Supreme Legislative Council through the interested efforts of these reformers, they will throw themselves into endless difficulties, since the Bill is tantamount to a marriage law or is a precursor to it. In the same paper, in another place, a correspondent refers to the meeting at Mádhavbág in Bombay, and advises the people not to be caught in the traps spread by the reformers and to throw up their reserve.

A story of an Emperor given to reform.

27. The Hindu Punch (34), in its issue of the 5th February, relates a story of a Mahomedan Emperor, which, it says, is either traditional or imaginary, and is given only for the sake of its moral. In short the story is as follows:—There was an Emperor by name Abdul Mehejid, who was very fond of effecting reforms in the ancient usages of his subjects. The people were in consequence much disgusted with him; but being disarmed and helpless they could do nothing beyond making threatening speeches and sneering at the Emperor. This, however, had no effect upon the prince, who on the force of the bayonet despised his subjects. Once upon a time the people—men, women and children—being much exasperated, turned out with whatever they could get hold of, and rebelled against their Emperor. The result was that the Emperor was brought to his senses, gave up the idea of reform, and reconciled the people, confessing before them that his strength lay in their contentment and happiness, and that his interests were identical with theirs.

A License and Medical Certificate Bill as a supplement to the Age of Consent Bill proposed in jest.

28. The same paper says in its usual jocular way, that it has received a petition from the reformers, praying that a Bill may be brought forward to substitute, in place of the Garbhádhána ceremony of which they wish to get rid, a law of license and medical certificate for the convenience of persons desirous of consummating their marriage on the payment of certain fees, as a supplement to the Age of Consent Bill.

Disapproval of the Age of Consent Bill.

29. The Bodh Sudhákar (9), in its issue of the 4th February, says that Government seem to have forgotten the lesson learnt from the Mutiny of 1857 and the assurances subsequently given in the Royal Proclamation in order to secure confidence of the people, which is essentially necessary for the permanency of the British rule in India, and observes that if the belief of the people that Government do not scruple to disregard the promises given from time to time were confirmed, the consequences would be very serious, that Government should not listen to the foolish and dangerous advice of Hindu reformers and a Pársi enthusiast to legislate in social matters, and that Government should bear in mind that if they add oppression in social matters to that in political matters, of which latter the people are already tired, the step will produce such flames as it will be found difficult to keep under control. In conclusion, the paper earnestly requests Government not to countenance the demand for raising the age of consent, and to shelve the Bill, as was done by Lord Dufferin in the case of the prayer for prohibiting early marriages, and asks them to grant the requests of the Indian National Congress if they really have the good of the subject people at heart, since the social evils pestering the Hindus are but the result of the miseries they are suffering from political disabilities.

30. The Gujaráti (82), in its issue of the 1st February, says that the Bill has caused widespread dissatisfaction among the Hindus, except a handful of reformers, that Dr. Bhándárkar has tried to mislead the public by quoting solitary sentences from the Shástras, that Professor Tilak's reply to him dispels all doubts on the subject, that the Honourable Mr. Justice Telang also supports the Bill, wrongly asserting that consummation immediately after the first menstruation is not made compulsory by the religion, and remarking that supposing it to be a religious duty its non-performance for a certain length of time may be met by a penance. Mr. Justice Telang's argument says the paper, will hardly raise him in public estimation.

31. The Gujarát Mitrá (83), in its issue of the 1st February, says :—There is no objection to the age of consent being raised from 10 to 12 years, but since a large majority is against this change, the limit might be fixed at 11 years, to which the people might not object so vehemently. The passing of the Bill might be well postponed, as it would not be discreet to displease the orthodox people while His Imperial Highness the Czarewitch is in the country, lest His Imperial Majesty the Czar, learning from his son that a majority of the people in India are discontented, may be encouraged to invade the country.

32. The Kásidc Mumbai (113), in its issue of the 6th February, observes that since the Bill interferes with the social usages of the people of India, the Honorary Secretary of the Anjumane Váyáz Islám and several others have, since Friday last, at the recommendation of some Moulvis, begun to preach in the mosques and streets of Bombay against the Bill, just as they did in the case of the intended performance of the French play of Prophet Mahomed, and that many religious Mahomedans have sent a requisition to the Anjumane Váyáz to convene a public meeting of the Mahomedan community to protest against the Bill.

33. The Rájyabhakta (118), in its issue of the 3rd February, observes :—The Bill mainly affects Hindus and Mahomedans, but a majority of the latter being illiterate, they cannot comprehend the responsibilities and the hardships which will arise on the Bill becoming a law, and therefore do not oppose the measure. The majority of educated Mahomedans have, however, protested against the Bill. Even if their whole community be in favour of the Bill, it may be made applicable to them alone, and not to the Hindus who oppose it. Because the Honourable Mr. Justice Telang, the Honourable Mr. Nulkar, Ráo Bahádur M. G. Ránade, Messrs. V. A. Modak, Narendra Nath, Sen, Raghunáthráo and a few others support the Bill it would not be right to say that the measure has met with the approval of the whole educated class. These gentlemen in common with Mr. Malabari are well known for their extreme notions of reformation and are hardly respected in the Hindu community for their religious views. At the most, the reformers number about one hundred thousand, and it would not be safe for Government to displease two hundred millions of people for the sake of these few. The Hindus pay utmost respect to their religion even at the risk of their lives, and if Government persisted in passing the Bill, the prediction made by the ancient sages of a great revolution taking place in Kaliyuga would be realized.

Difference of opinion between two eminent persons regarding the Shástric aspect of the Age of Consent Bill.

34. The Gujarát Mitra (83), in its issue of the 1st February, writes :—The Honourable Mr. Justice Telang in the Times of India of the 27th instant controverts in the most distinct terms the opinion of the Honourable Mr. Justice Mitra expressed in the Viceroy's Council for the acceptance of Raghunandan as a final authority in religious matters. The Bombay High Court Judge even controverts the fact that the Bengal Pandits recognise Raghunandan as a very great authority. So it has at length come to pass that two eminent scholars, both rivalling each other in ancient and modern learning, have found it impossible to agree with each other on a question of religion. What wonder is, then, to take Mr. Nulkar's words as plain truth that there can never be perfect unanimity amongst the interpreters of ancient Hindu philosophy? For ourselves we thank Mr. Telang for the stern manliness with which he has come forward to strengthen the hands of the British Government quite in the very nick of time.

Some of the objections raised by the opponents of the Age of Consent Bill considered reasonable and some amendments recommended.

35. The Phœnix (5), in its issue of the 31st January, writes :—Those who have not been carefully following the Bengal opposition to the Age of Consent Bill can scarcely realise how much of the opposition is manufactured or made to order. That there is some real opposition, there can be no doubt; but the large proportion which the agitation is attaining is scarcely of a real character. Many false issues have been raised, and people have been unnecessarily alarmed. The Bill as introduced is capable of some reasonable amendment, and this should be made, not merely in deference to the clamour of opposition, but to prevent oppression. The Bill provides for two amendments, (1) that the age of consent as between the wife and husband should be raised to 12 as also between strangers, and (2) that proceedings against the husband should be by summons, although the punishment is the same. Under this Bill a husband having sexual intercourse with his wife before she is 12 years of age with or without her consent will be guilty of rape, whether there are any injuries or not, or whether there is any violence or not. The law, it is recognised, cannot interfere with the marriageable age of girls. The amendment now proposed is to the effect that a girl should not be allowed to live in the same house with her husband before she is 12 years, or, if living in the same house, they should not be allowed to sleep together. A girl may reach puberty before 12, and consummation of marriage may follow without any evil results. This fact, if established, will convict the husband of rape. Take another case. A girl may be over 12 years, although there may be no documentary evidence of it, as it is not customary among Hindus to cast horoscopes of girls, and the husband may be permitted to consummate marriage. Information is laid before a Magistrate that the girl is under 12. An inquiry must follow, and evidence of a conflicting nature, both as regards the age and virginity of the girl, will have to be taken if the case is one of natural and easy consummation. All this is possible under the Bill, and all this means encroachment of very serious nature on the privacy of a family. The operation of the measure must be restricted to safer limits in the case of families. That is quite evident. And a husband who consummates marriage with his wife's consent after she has attained puberty can scarcely be considered guilty of rape. These are objections which are reasonable, and which should be considered and taken into account in Committee. In cases in which there is no serious physical violence, the girl's family should have the right of action, which will be quite sufficient. The opponents of the Bill may be conciliated with such a safeguard. The Legal Member and the Viceroy feel that the measure as proposed cannot become directly operative without very serious consequences, and an amendment in that direction will be quite in conformity with the declared policy of Government.

Comments on the plea of expediency put forward by His Excellency the Viceroy in his speech on the Age of Consent Bill.

36. In a contributed article the Dnyánodaya (12), in its issue of the 5th February, writes:—What is a personal injury to any soul is an injury to society, for we are all members of one another. Since the spiritual vision of mankind as a whole is very dull, there is almost no service which any man can do his fellow-man so valuable as to keep his own spiritual eye bright and even to make its power keener. This is the service which poets and prophets do to mankind. But when men lose respect for those fellow-men whom they see to be governed by expediency and not by convictions of right, then they all are the poorer. This is undoubtedly the teaching of experience, and this is the philosophy of human nature. Any boy would be a fool who cared more for the laugh or sneer of a stranger or even of a playmate than the approval of his parents. A man is a fool who cares more for the present good opinion of an associate than for the approval of his conscience. Still more is a man most unwise who cares more for present freedom from the opposition of his fellow-men than for the approval of his God. But this is exactly what he does who lets expediency turn him from doing what he believes to be right and true. We could give many examples of this unwisdom. What led us to take up this subject now is the attitude of multitudes of officials in regard to many questions of moral reform. India is a great country and a conservative country, and that changes should be prudently proposed and pushed, we entirely grant. Nevertheless even prudent and conservative Indians feel, cannot help but feel, that a deep moral earnestness does not characterize the official world as a whole. In consequence, the Government has lost a considerable measure of respect and influence over the best part of the nation. And as expediency always works, this temporizing policy has brought only new difficulties to Government. The wild outcry to the Bill raising the age of consent to twelve years has been, we believe, encouraged by the apologetic tone of the Viceroy on the subject.

PART III.—Education.

The question of abolishing the Matriculation Examination and the educational policy of Government.

37. The Subodh Patrika (18), in its issue of the 1st February, refers to the speech of the Vice-Chancellor at the last Convocation of the Bombay University in which he alluded to the proposed abolition of the Matriculation Examination, and observes:—Seeing that the yearly increase in the number of candidates for this examination was undesirable and opposed to their policy of discouraging higher education, Government have hit upon the plan of abolishing the examination—a plan which will ultimately lead to the abolition of Government colleges for want of students. Instead of removing the defects in the present course of instruction, which does not teach morality, self-respect and love for the country, it is much to be regretted that Government should think of abolishing the examination altogether.

Disapproval of the proposed change in the appointments of Professors of Government Colleges.

38. The Kaiser-i-Hind (85), in its issue of the 1st February, observes:—The recent educational policy of the Bombay Government has led people to suppose that Government are trying to shelve their responsibilities. The proposal of some members of the India Council to make the appointments of Professors last for a period of five years only has caused universal regret among the people. The Times of India has made a timely protest against it, and the Bombay Government and the people ought to follow suit. The proposal, if adopted, would debar good English scholars from coming out to India under such uncertain prospects, and even if some came, they would have to leave their work at a time when it might be reasonably expected that they would be useful. There would also be no uniformity in the standard of teachers; and if men of sound learning be not forthcoming, it will be necessary to draw upon men of second-rate abilities, who would be much inferior to some of the distinguished Indian graduates. The Government Colleges have, in their struggle for superiority with private Colleges, hitherto been able to hold their own on account of the able Professors who have been here, and as soon as they retire and are succeeded by people of mediocre talents, Government Colleges must suffer heavily.

Part IV.—Municipalities.

Withdrawal of a statement made in a previous issue about His Excellency Lord Harris exercising his influence over the Bombay Municipal Corporation.

39. The Kaiser-i-Hind (85), in its issue of the 1st February, writes:—Referring to the article, headed, "A Danger to Bombay Municipal Government," which appeared in our issue of the 18th ultimo, we have every reason to believe, from the information received, that His Excellency Lord Harris never entertained the idea attributed to him, of exercising the slightest influence, as Governor, in the affairs of our Municipal Corporation. We are glad to hear this for the sake of the preservation of the municipal independence of the city. In fact, we observed at the time that the report which had reached us, required verification. The information now received entirely removes any wrong impression which may have got abroad.

Remarks in connection with the recent Government Resolution censuring the Poona Municipality.

40. The Bombay Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 2nd February, notices the explanation published by Mr. Námjoshi in connection with certain charges preferred against him and the Poona Municipality in the recent Government Resolution censuring that Corporation, and observes that this explanation seems to completely demolish the charges, and that it behoves Government to call upon the Collector of Poona for an explanation on the subject, and to publish the correspondence for the information of the public, who have suspended their judgment till they should hear what Government have to say in regard to the explanations published by Mr. Gokhale and Mr. Námjoshi. [The Gujaráti (82) of the 1st, the Jáme Jamshed (107) of the 4th, and the Satyavakta (121) of the 6th February, express similar sentiments.]

41. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 2nd February, writes:—The severe reproof administered by Government to the Municipality of Poona was, it now appears, given without giving the Municipality, and the persons concerned, an opportunity of defending themselves. This is indeed a hard proceeding, if true. Two of the members, who were singled out for special censure in connection with the election cases, have published their explanations, which certainly seem to be satisfactory. The Municipality, as a whole, is also, we learn, in a fair position to answer the charges levelled against it. There is thus ground to think that the severe judgment passed against it will have to be revised. It is to be regretted that the officers of Government, in their eagerness to secure a conviction, should have shown such a flagrant disregard of the rudimentary rules of a public enquiry. Let us hope Government will give the Municipality every facility to clear its character, and that the Municipality will succeed in the end in coming scatheless out of the ordeal.

42. The Kaiser-i-Hind (85), in its issue of the 1st February, writes:—It is pretty evident that the Government has published the Resolution regarding the Poona Municipality without caring to ascertain the exact facts. Two gentlemen, referred to by names in the Resolution, have already published their explanation; and we now hear that the Municipality itself is preparing an elaborate rejoinder. It is clear that Government have acted most unfairly towards the Municipality by having studiously avoided giving that body an opportunity to repel the allegations and justify its management. That was the straightforward and obvious course which it ought to have adopted. And it was further unfair, nay scandalous, to have immediately published a Resolution on the one-sided statements and information which the Collector, for reasons best known to himself, forwarded to Government. The procedure was altogether unfair, and the judgment must, after all, be pronounced as ex cathedra. It is a matter of profound regret that the intense prejudice which the present administration has conceived towards the Poona Municipality should have led it into this error of policy. Government ought to be impartial and hear both sides. But here it has gone altogether on one-sided information. What has Mr. Lee-Warner to say to this unfair attitude of his Government? Is it in accord with his famous four canons of criticism? Who is responsible for it? Will he condescend to enlighten the public, so that an impartial judgment may be possible on the "Bombay Castle" Resolution?

43. The Shiváji (64), in its issue of the 30th January, says that the explanation given by Ráo Sáheb Gokhale in the Bombay Gazette makes it plain that the charge brought by Government against the Poona Municipality, that they incurred extravagant expense in defending the suits filed against some of their members in the matter of election, is without foundation, and that the Resolution issued by Government against the Municipality was made in hot haste without due enquiry. His Excellency Lord Harris does not, adds the paper, seem to recognise his responsibility. The system of appointing Governors only for the limited period of five years seems to be intended to deprive officers of long standing in the country of opportunities of carrying on intrigues, and to give the country the benefit of the generous tendencies of new Governors. If this view be correct, the course which Lord Harris has adopted is disappointing. There is yet time for His Excellency to take steps to get at the truth and to put an end to the present confusion, and we hope he will do so.

44. The Kesari (43), in its issue of the 3rd February, is glad that Ráo Sáheb Námjoshi and other Municipal Commissioners of Poona have been awakened and are trying to disprove the charges brought against them by Government in a recent Resolution, and remarks:—Mr. Námjoshi's explanation clearly shows the futility of the charges brought against him. It is, however, to be regretted that an elderly, experienced and learned officer like Mr. East should, at the instigation of a busybody, have brought serious charges against the Poona Municipality on a superficial enquiry.

Government officials and the Poona Municipality.

45. In an article, headed, "Unfairly and groundlessly condemned," the Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 1st February, writes:—The times have changed. Formerly we heard of people conspiring against authorities; now authorities conspire against the people. Whether the people conspire or the authorities, the course is dangerous to Government; it is the more so when their own representatives conspire, than when the people do so, because the people can be put down with a strong hand, but they cannot put down their representatives in that way. The conspiracy against the Poona Municipality is of a more dangerous kind. It is the conspiracy of the representatives of Government against self-government. It will not be difficult to understand why this should be so. In this presidency, self-government was not given, but taken, and that, too, against the strong protest of the Civilian satraps. Mr. Robertson, who was then the king of the Central Division, in his letter No. 1513 of 1882, said that the experiment was "altogether a dangerous one." This was the opinion of many of his colleagues in the administration also. But the pressure of Lord Ripon's Government was very great, and the Government of Bombay gave way and the district officers had perforce to follow suit. Sir James Fergusson framed the Acts, and it fell to the lot of Lord Reay to put the measures into operation. So long as the control of affairs was with Lord Reay, no appreciable complaints were made about the working of these bodies, although indications were not wanting to show what would happen under a ruler with other views. These five years gave the opponents of the measures of Indian liberalization time to think and hatch the irplans, and they are now ready. During these five years, on the other hand, the National Congress was making progress and developing the scheme of Legislative Council reform. This reform was very strongly pressed on the attention of the authorities in England, and the success of Municipal Boards was called in evidence. This piece of evidence was almost conclusive, and we know that opinions are agreed to make these self-governing bodies the constituencies for election to Legislative Councils. This was probably the last straw to make the district satraps lose their patience, and they thought the time had arrived when they should appear on the platform and begin to run down the work of the elected people. The ways of discrediting this work are many, and each is followed more or less; but two of them appear to find greater favour than the rest. The first is that of putting in nominees who, not enjoying the confidence of the people, may be the apologists of the officials. The second is that of discrediting work done by stigmatising the same as slow, partial and even corrupt. Caste prejudices must, of course, come in. The work of discrediting is generally done in demi-official letters, private and confidential reports, and by encouraging nominee Commissioners to throw, if they can, municipal work into disorder. In making these observations we refer to municipalities in general in this presidency, and we are prepared, as we progress, to cite specific instances. Násik, Sátára, Kalyán, Lonávli, Belgaum, Ahmednagar and many other places have had their turn, and it is very unfortunate that Poona has to pass through the same ordeal now. It is a very bold step indeed, and on the success or failure of this step will depend the fate of mofussil towns. The present attempt at discrediting the municipal administration of the city is, so far as is known to the public, the third of its kind, and it must be said, to the credit of Government and of the people of the city, that on both the previous occasions they intervened between the two parties to the cause, and satisfied the ends of public justice. The first attempt was made in 1885, but without success. The Municipality, the local press and the public fought hard, and Government, having given a full hearing to both the sides, delivered its decision for the Municipality. The second attempt was made in 1887, and it was an open secret that the hand was raised to strike, but it would not come down. The present is the third attempt. On the first, as also on the second, occasion the Municipality was allowed the right of self-defence, with the result that its opponents had to quit the ground. There are unmistakable indications that now, too, Government would do justice and nothing but justice. Under these circumstances our first prayer is strike, but hear them. We make this prayer, because in the Resolution of January 6th—a Resolution that has created almost a panic—there is nothing whatever to show that the Municipality has been heard in its defence. Undoubtedly the Municipality has a defence, and it will make it. If Government does not hear, the public will. We are no advocates of the Municipality, but we do claim to be the spokesmen of the wronged, and, as such, we try to place before the world what facts we have in our possession. The charges against the Municipality made in the Resolution may be grouped under three heads:—(a) Culpable neglect of rules; (b) culpable neglect of ordinary financial precautions; and (c) serious waste of municipal funds. All the three charges are heavy enough and require refutation. But the first two may stand over for some time: the third cannot do so, and must be taken up first. It is a pity that the point of this whole charge is entirely misunderstood. When Ráo Bahádur Joglekar complained of large sums of money being spent on compensation, he did not mean to insinuate that there was anything like culpable waste. What he really complained of was that the General Committee had, according to existing practice, least knowledge about details. His contention was, however, misunderstood, and has now assumed serious aspect. Somebody must be held responsible for this misunderstanding, but of that we shall say by and by. Our duty, for the present, consists in explaining what the battle between the square foot and the rental is. It is the war that is at present waging between the Municipality and its opponents. That part of the Resolution which treats of the compensation matter is the smoke arising from the guns of arguments fired on both the sides. This smoke has blinded the eyes of Government, and it is necessary to drive this smoke, in order to make the real issues clearly perceptible both to Government and the public. We shall try to do so, and we hope with success. The letter of the Collector and the Resolution of Government refer to three compensation cases, the first of which is thus stated :—In one case, the land measuring 675 square feet was purchased by the Managing Committee for widening a street at the rate of Rs. 6 per square foot, while land more favourably situated was obtained a few years ago at Rs. 1-12-0 per square foot. Moreover, after the agreement in respect of this land was drawn up and the amount of compensation finally settled, the Managing Committee allowed the vendor to put up shop-boards, steps and other erections, with the effect that the space left available for widening the street was reduced from 675 to 532 square feet, thus raising the price of the land actually occupied to Rs. 7-8-0 per square foot. This is the piece of land added to the street in front of Moroba Dáda's Váda. The objections here are two, viz., that the rate of Rs. 6 per square foot is excessive as compared to the rate of Rs. 1-12-0, and that the space left available for widening the street was reduced by 143 feet. We tried to find out this piece of ground more favourably situated and bought at Rs. 1-12-0. But we have not found it. While in search of this, we, however, found another piece of land near about the one in dispute, which was also bought by the Municipality for street-widening. This is the part of Mr. Joshi's house in front of Karve's. The rate at which this was bought, comes to Rs. 8 per square foot. It must be mentioned that this price, higher than the one now paid, was fixed by an independent panch. The second case in the Resolution is thus stated :—In the second case a verandah measuring 184 square feet was purchased, in November 1889, at the rate of Rs. 6 per square foot, or a total of Rs. 1,050. That this price was an exorbitant one is clearly shown by the fact reported by the Collector (Appendix E) that the whole house (of two storeys, standing on 765 square feet of ground) was sold in November 1888 for Rs. 1,900. This refers to a piece of land in Vetál Peth. Just opposite this corner and to the south-east is a piece of land bought by the Municipality measuring about 64 square feet. The compensation of this was awarded by the District Court. The rate of the compensation allowed by the Municipality for the land referred to by Government if measured by the square foot is a little above Rs. 5; the rate per foot as determined by the District Court of the place we refer to is Rs. 9. The Government puts the third case as follows :—In the third case a small shop measuring 37 square feet was purchased by the Managing Committee for Rs. 1,050 (Rs. 150 representing the cost of the building and Rs. 900 the cost of the site). This gives a rate of Rs. 24 per square foot—a price which, as the Collector justly observes (Appendix F), is unheard of in Poona. This refers to a house in Moti Chowk. As in contrast with this may be quoted an instance of land acquired in the same locality. This latter piece measured about 46 square feet, and the cost of this was Rs. 1,027, or at the rate of a little over Rs. 22. The parallels of cases 2 and 3 are instances of land purchased by the Municipality when it was under the direction of the Collector. Now, in regard to cases of compensation paid for pieces of land, it is no conclusive evidence either way to show that pieces of land near about were bought at a higher or a lower price. Such evidence is strong, but not conclusive. Instances of lands in important localities can be pointed to, in which adjoining pieces immensely differ in prices, because they differ so much in their rentals. There is also this fact to be kept in mind, viz., that large and small pieces of ground cannot be bought at a uniform square foot rate. To avoid these several difficulties the Municipality has in recent years been following the rule laid down by the Honourable the High Court in the case of Carey vs. Banumia reported at page 34, Volume X of the Bombay High Court Reports. The Municipality in one of its representations has shown that they had given up the square-foot rate principle in favour of that laid down by the Honourable High Court, and the figures we have quoted show that the Municipality has not been a loser for that.

A complaint against the Vice-President of the Surat Municipality and a request to Government in the matter.

46. In alluding to the proceedings of the adjourned General Meeting of the Surat Municipality held on the 31st ultimo, the Gujarát Darpan (81), in its issue of the 5th February, observes :—When the question of the encroachment on a public road by Mr. Kálábhái Lallubhái, a Municipal Commissioner, in building his house came to be discussed, several Commissioners objected to Mr. Kálábhái's addressing the meeting, as it was not possible to divest him of the position of 'applicant.'

Mr. Kálábhái protested, and was eventually allowed by the President, Dr. Dosábhái Pestanji, to address as 'Commissioner.' The President ought not to have done this. The whole conduct of the President in connection with this business was arbitrary and illegal, and we recommend Government to scrutinize the proceedings of the meeting. The Darpan thinks that those Commissioners who sided with Mr. Kálábhái in his attempt to thwart the Municipality in its endeavours to recover the land are not fit to remain on the Commission, and is glad that the decision of the Managing Committee to recover the plot was ultimately upheld by the meeting.

PART V.—Native States.

47. The Svadesh Bandhu (128), in its issue of the 4th February, complains that thefts frequently occur at Cambay, and requests the Special Political Agent to take prompt steps in the matter, re-engaging the services of Ráo Bahádur Mansukhrám in place of Mr. T. G. Foard, Superintendent of Police, if necessary.

Frequent thefts committed at Cambay and a request to the authorities in the matter.

1. Referring to the Viceroy's declaration about the attitude which Government servants should bear towards the Indian National Congress, the Varhád Samáchár (3), in its issue of the 2nd February, observes:—We shall now see how far this explanation of the orders will be attended with desirable practical effects in Berár. The Akola District seemed to have been singular in making a great fuss about the old circular. Mr. H. S. Nicholetts will do us the favour of studying the Viceroy's reply. We do not intend to cast any slur upon him when we single him out. We have heard people talk well as well as ill when he persistently desired all his subordinates to act up to the orders honestly and to the very letter. His policy would have been more acceptable if he had seen how far his strict measures would attain the desired end. It was advisable for him to settle, by a reference to higher authorities, whether Deshmukhs, Deshpándes and others came within the definition of Government servants before he asked them to obey his orders. We are aware of many of his good qualities, though we are forced to say that they are not without some drawbacks. His goodness often takes through enthusiasm and intolerance so high a pitch as to lean to the side of an agreeable weakness in his nature, and it is no indiscreet and inopportune praise to say that he is duly proud of his connection with this district. What we want from him at present is that he should so fashion his actions as to be in conformity with the concluding portion of the Viceroy's reply —"All Government servants shall abstain from active participation in political or quasi-political movements of all kinds."

Government order regarding the attitude of Government servants towards the Indian National Congress and its practical effect in Berár.

2. The Vaidarbh (2), in its issue of the 31st January, writes:—The "Age of Consent" Bill has met with opposition from prejudice and ignorance, which was to be expected. It is only to be pitied that a few men of education, intelligence and culture are also carried away by their feelings into an attitude of hostility to a measure, the humanity and justice of which they will in their calmer moments admit. If it is permissible to venture into an enquiry into the causes of this attitude of our educated friends it will have to be stated that the manner in which the gentleman who has taken the leading part in the reform movement, and has carried on his operations, has performed his part, has much to answer for. Forgetting that he was an outsider, he did not handle the question of social reform among the Hindus with that delicacy, reserve and freedom from dogmatism which were essential to the popularisation of his efforts. He indulged in exaggerated statements and often drew unwarrantable conclusions from them; and though he had good motives he assumed an aggressive attitude and used an offensive style which set up the backs of many who would otherwise have joined the party of reform. It is difficult at this moment to say whether Mr. Malabari has done more harm than good. The reactionary spirit, in some quarters at least, is distinctly traceable to irritation at his wholesale attacks. But whatever this might be, we would entreat our countrymen to remember that the wisdom or unwisdom of Mr. Malabari's procedure, and the correctness or otherwise of his statements, ought absolutely to form no elements in determining their attitude towards the cause of social reform. As persons vitally interested in the welfare of their community the Hindus ought to deal with that problem on its merits. The notes of Dr. Bhándárkar and the Honourable Mr. Telang conclusively establish the hollowness of the "religious argument." We cannot conceive how any one acquainted with the actual facts of present Hindu society can have the hardihood to assert that non-performance of the Garbhádhána ceremony will entail "loss of religion." Go to any village and you will find that while actual connection has taken place even before puberty (in itself a heinous sin according to orthodox authorities), the performance of the religious ceremony, the essential nature of which is now so pointedly asserted, is deferred for months and years.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Part I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

The Government of India and the Indian National Congress.

1. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 8th February, writes:—We heartily thank the Viceroy for his manly and straightforward letter to Mr. Hume and Mr. Mehta regarding the Indian National Congress. Really it is characteristically British. The Government of India, we are glad to read, solemnly declares the Congress to be a legitimate movement, and compares it to the Advanced Liberal party in Europe. Every private person and every pensioner is free to join it. What the Government wants to do is simply to stand neutral, being neither hostile nor friendly. It is very assuring to behold that the circular of March 1890 had no particular reference to the Congress movement, and did not arise out of it. Anglo-Indian and other officials were naturally, to a certain extent, under a misapprehension as to the attitude of the Government towards this movement. Now their doubts will surely be removed by this explicit declaration by the highest authority in the land, that the Congress agitation is perfectly legitimate and perfectly constitutional. This is a very hopeful sign of the times, and, as Mr. Hume rightly observes, it will produce a marked change in the attitude of Anglo-Indian officials, who are, above all, thorough gentlemen, towards the national movement. It may also lead one day to induce the Government to go a step further and recognise in the Congress one of its mighty co-operators for the general weal of India. The Viceregal declaration is very auspicious, indeed, coming as it does from a Conservative Viceroy. The people all over the country ought to publicly thank their Governor-General for such an outspoken and sympathetic pronouncement. By the bye, we cannot help thinking that the very moderate speeches of Messrs. Manmohan Ghose and Pherozshah Mehta have had some share in inducing Government to concede this partial recognition to the Congress.

Disapproval of Mr. C. W. Chitty's appointment as Acting Chief Judge of the Small Causes Court, Bombay.

2. The Native Opinion (16), in its issue of the 12th February, finds fault with the appointment of Mr. C. W. Chitty, Barrister-at-Law, as Acting Chief Judge, Bombay Small Causes Court, saying:—There can be no question that Ráo Bahádur Mahádev Govind Ránade, who has for years worked as a Small Cause Court Judge and is one of the oldest Advocates, is infinitely better fitted than Mr. Chitty, to discharge the responsible duties of Chief Judge of the Bombay Small Causes Court, and his appointment would have met with universal approbation. Besides, Mr. Kharshedji, Third Judge of the Bombay Small Cause Court, is also a Barrister and has on a former occasion acted as Chief Judge. It is difficult to understand why he too has been overlooked. Why could not Ráo Bahádur Ganpatráo Bháskarji have been given a lift? The appointment of Mr. Chitty under these circumstances must, we think, tend to lower the dignity of the Chief Judgeship and lead to the impression that Government patronage is very rarely distributed with discretion, and that the claims of Natives, however eminent they may be, are at times very lightly set aside. [The Gujaráti (82) and the Kaiser-i-Hind (85), in their issues of the 8th February express similar sentiments.]

Mr. Lee-Warner, Secretary to the Bombay Government.

3. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 9th February, charges Mr. Lee-Warner, Secretary to the Bombay Government, with being hasty in the matter of the correspondence between him and Mr. Pherozshah M. Mehta on the subject of the Fawcett Memorial Fund published in the Times of India, and hopes that similar precipitation is not shown by him in the discharge of his functions as Secretary to Government.

4. The Hitechchhu (84) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 12th February, observes:—Mr. Lee-Warner is an able officer who could do much good to the Natives if he was so minded; but, unfortunately, he entertains erroneous notions about them like many of his compeers. His recent letter to the Times of India on the subject of the Fawcett Memorial Fund was probably intended to dissuade the people from subscribing to the fund that might be started in memory of the late Mr. Charles Bradlaugh, M. P. Mr. Mehta, however, gave him a satisfactory reply. Hasty conduct is inexcusable in such a high official as Mr. Lee-Warner and is likely to do harm to Government and to the people. The recent Government resolutions regarding the Native States of Porbandar, Cambay, &c., and the municipalities of Poona and some other cities were probably the result of hasty action on the part of Government officials.

A lottery at Jalgaon.

5. The Khándesh Chitragupta (44), in its issue of the 8th February, complains of two Europeans having opened a sort of lottery business at Jalgaon in Khándesh whereby hundreds of persons have been defrauded, and asks whether Europeans are exempted from the penalty imposed by law for keeping a lottery house.

Part II.—Legislation.

The Age of Consent Bill and Government responsibility in the matter.

6. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 8th February, writes:—The issues involved in the controversy about the Age of Consent Bill are simply these: (1) Has the British Government a right or not to legislate against crimes, if these crimes are committed under the cloak of religion? (2) Has the British Government a right or not to protect minors from the wrong-doing of their guardians? These are the real questions to be decided. The case of the child-wife is stronger than the case of the slave. Slavery was a social evil. No physiologists and no doctors certified that slavery was a violation of the physical law, just as they unanimously certify that consummation with a girl under twelve or fourteen years is a violation of such law. There were many slaves who said they were happy. There were even many who deprecated the relief which the Legislature intended for them. During the war between the North and the South in America, the slave-owners could plead that the slaves were contented and did not desire any change. There is nothing surprising to us, therefore, in what Sir Steuart Bayley has written regarding the views of the female sex in Bengal. We do not know who was his informant. The sex, as a rule, is dumb; but if it is true that Bengali women enforce early cohabitation, the fact proves that the evil has reached its acme. It has been indulged in to such an extent that the sufferers have come to regard it as a matter of course. The responsibility of the Government is all the greater for this fact. It should make a brighter future possible to the sex. It should not deny that protection to a married child which even the orthodox would extend to the unmarried. In Dr. Lyon's Text-Book of Medical Jurisprudence, which has been revised as to the legal matter by such an eminent lawyer as Mr. Inverarity, we are told that the English law of rape makes no distinction between married and unmarried girls. But even if it did, we here in India are differently circumstanced. As we have so often pointed out, it is only India that can boast of child-wives and child-mothers.

7. The Sudhárak (19), in its issue of the 9th February, writes:—The Government of India has not hitherto allowed the Shástras to shelter, for any length of time, practices which an enlightened Government, regardful of the true interests of the subjects, is bound to regard as criminal. Even when the spread of Western education was far less in this country than what it now is, and when the hold of religious beliefs was, in consequence, a great deal stronger on the mind of the people, the British Government did not hesitate to fearlessly come forward as the champion of humanity and enlightenment and to put down with a strong hand religious crimes like Sati and Infanticide. Will that Government waver now in legislating against a monstrous practice which is steadily and surely undermining the strength and the energy of the nation, at a time when hardly one man in a hundred thousand knows what the real injunctions of the Shástras are, and hardly one in a million strictly conforms to those injunctions? It is all very well to say that reform must come from within and should not be thrust on a community from without. What, as Professor Selby asks, if there be no desire in the community to reform? Is the Government to stand by with folded arms and tolerate the perpetration of barbarities, waiting for a time, which may never come, when the benumbed sense of the victims would be, of its own accord, sufficiently roused to revolt against those barbarities? If the Government were to act on doctrines such as these, it might as well abdicate its trust; for the only justification for the presence of Englishmen in India is their enlightened and fearless endeavours for the welfare and elevation of the people of this land.

British legislation and the Hindu scriptural injunctions.

8. The Din Bandhu (10), in its issue of the 8th February, writes:—The Hindu religion is in danger, say these patriots and defenders of their ancestral faith. The proposed amendment of the Penal Code for the protection of girls of tender age is represented as a violation of Hindu scriptural injunctions, which may bring down upon the people the wrath of Heaven. One has no patience to listen to these expressions of false piety from men who, where their own interests are involved, are daily breaking the most sacred exhortations of the Rishis without the least fear of descending to the nether regions. We hear of a monster meeting to be held to-day at Mádhav Bág here. We would ask the promoters, after they have amply protested against Sir A. Scoble's Bill, to petition the Viceroy to amend the Penal Code rather in the direction indicated in the following commands of Manu. For, who knows, the absence from the Penal Code of these provisions for maintaining the supremacy of the priestly classes may be the cause of Heaven's wrath and of the people's poverty? If the Government of India should be guided by the Shástras, those who say so cannot consistently refrain from urging that the following, along with many other similar beneficent mandates, should be embodied in the penal and civil codes of this country. Here are the injunctions of Manu: (1) "The Shudra who shall with any member of his body strike the person of one of superior caste shall have that member cut off." (2) "If the Shudra should raise his hand to strike one of a superior caste, his hand shall be cut off; if in danger he shall strike with his foot, it shall be cut off." (3) "If a Shudra desires to sit on the same seat with one of superior caste, he shall be branded in the loins and expelled the country." (4) "If a Shudra amass wealth, the Bráhman shall unshrinkingly seize the whole of it; for the Shudra has no right to wealth: whatever he accumulates belongs to his lord." (5) "If the Shudra be skilful, still he shall not lay by riches; for if a Shudra have riches, the Bráhman will be annoyed." (6) "Acts that are sinful in a Bráhman are not so in the case of a Shudra, and he requires no purification; for the rights of religion are not his and consequently he does not suffer from the loss of them." (7) "If a low-caste man attempt to instruct a superior in virtue, boiling ghee shall be poured down his throat."

9. The Dnyánodaya (12), in its issue of the 12th February, writes:—The principle of religious neutrality for Government is a good one; but this does not mean that Government can let crimes go unpunished because they are committed in the name of religion. This is not neutrality, but indifference to the rights of the oppressed. Neutrality means that no one shall be forced by Government to do what he considers wrong. It does not mean that the cloak of religion can shield a man from punishment because he has put it on when doing an injury to another. The English Government has always erred on the side of yielding too much to those popular errors that have the sanction of the Hindu religion, but there is a limit to such yielding. Justice, mercy and humanity must rule the land, even though the Shástras in some of their teachings conflict with them. The Hindu Shástras show a religion intended for the strong. They take the side of the mighty against the weak. The daughter, the sister, the mother, the widow, have scant blessings meted out to them when man's prejudice comes in the way. What Shástra ever thought of burning men when their wives died? What Shástra teaches the keeping of the sons in ignorance and teaching the daughters? The English Government cannot therefore be guided by the maxims of the Shástras when they would prevent the punishment of the strong for oppressing or injuring the weak. Let the Shástras keep silence, and let justice and mercy and an enlightened conscience dictate what shall be the laws of India for the welfare of its millions.

Adverse remarks on the Age of Consent Bill.

10. While writing against the Age of Consent Bill, the Native Opinion (16), in its issue of the 8th February, makes the following observations:—The argument from previous interference by the British Legislature with the Hindu religion adduced by the legislationists in the present case is unsound and does not support their cause. Because the Inám Commission deprived people of their lands, Lord Lytton misused the Famine Fund, Clive made use of forged documents in acquiring territory, and Lord Dalhousie annexed Native States, does it follow that these precedents should be cited as authority for doing similar things now? Nobody adduced this argument from precedents when Burmah and Kashmere were taken over by the British Government. Will the legislationists make use of it for the annexation of Indore, Baroda, Gwalior, &c.? We object to the present Bill for this very reason. As the reformers adduce instances of past interference in support of the present Bill, so they will adduce this as an argument for the prohibition of marriages till the age of 14 or 16 hereafter. Otherwise, we do not care much for the present Bill. Professor Selby censures those who oppose the Bill on the score of religious interference for what he calls dishonesty. But he forgets that it was Dr. Bhándárkar and the Honourable Mr. Justice Telang who first started this controversy and deserve his censure. The present controversy has been embittered by one misunderstanding, and it is this. The legislationists insinuate that those who are opposed to the Bill are of opinion that intercourse with a woman before puberty is a desirable thing; but this insinuation is unfair. The opponents of the Bill are entirely against such intercourse and would be very glad if a law were passed to prohibit such intercourse, as it would, instead of opposing the Hindu religion, confirm its injunctions. But the present Bill aims at nothing like it and is only a makeshift. Instead of being useful to bring to book persons guilty of premature intercourse, the Bill will only make persons having intercourse with girls showing signs of puberty before the age of 12 years liable to severe punishment. It is this injustice that we clamour against. The charge of inhumanity brought against the Hindu religion is entirely unmeaning. This religion is more particularly opposed to premature intercourse than Christianity is; neither our religion nor our custom is inhuman. The charge ought rather to be brought against the Bill under discussion. If in ninety-five cases out of a hundred puberty is not reached before the age of thirteen or fourteen years as statistics prove, and if the present Bill, unlike the Hindu religion, indirectly permits cohabitation after twelve years, which is inhuman, the Hindu law or the Government Bill? In short, we see no wisdom in fixing the limit of twelve years instead of the attainment of puberty as the proper age of consent. The Bill, as it is, is simply injurious and likely to needlessly hurt the feelings of the people. [The Kesari (43), in its issue of the 10th idem, expresses almost the same sentiments.]

11. The Jagadhitechchhu (15), in its issue of the 7th February, says that no Hindu can bring himself to believe that in putting forward the Age of Consent Bill Government are actuated by a desire to afford protection to young girls, when Government have turned a deaf ear to the piteous entreaties of the people to mitigate the hardships inflicted by the harsh rules relating to the conservancy of forests, the duty on salt and the Arms Act. In advocating the passing of the Bill into law, Europeans of all grades and positions from the Governor-General to the engine-driver seem to entertain the sinister object to reduce the Hindus to the condition of their slaves by upsetting their religion and corrupting their social usages, and ultimately to make them adopt English manners and customs and the Christian religion. After the present Bill which proposes to raise the age of consent to twelve years is passed, this limit is sure to be extended still more hereafter. The Bill is likely to serve as a good handle to evil-minded persons to bring into trouble many simple and honest men and women, and it is the duty of every orthodox Hindu to bring about the defeat of the Bill by taking effectual steps against it as early as possible.

12. The Hindu Punch (34), in its issue of the 12th February, publishes an imaginary dialogue between an old woman and a young girl, in which the former tries to induce the latter to complain to a Magistrate about premature intercourse having been had with her by her husband and to pray for protection, in order that the hands of the reformers who are in favour of the Age of Consent Bill may be strengthened, and the girl curses the old woman, the reformers and the Bill alike for their scheme to deprive married girls of the protection of their husbands and put them under that of the reformers and the law, with the intention to increase the attendance at the Shárada Sadan institution started by Pandita Ramábái at Poona and to mislead young girls from the path of virtue.

Mr. Hume's alleged threats to the Hindus for their protest against the Age of Consent Bill.

13. The Prabhákar (17), in its issue of the 10th February, refers to a current report that Mr. Hume, Secretary of the Indian National Congress, has expressed his opinion that persons who are against the Age of Consent Bill should get none of the political rights prayed for by the Congress, and asks whether it is not better that the Congress should be defeated in its aims than that the people should yield to threats of withholding political rights from persons who do not send their women to dance at balls or do not embrace Christianity.

Request to the Honourable Mr. J. Nugent with reference to the Age of Consent Bill.

14. The Vártáhar (20), in its issue of the 8th February, says:—The Honourable Mr. John Nugent is a representative of the Bombay Presidency at the Supreme Legislative Council, and by his natural shrewdness, love of truth and vast experience of the social and religious usages of the people of this part of the country he is eminently fitted to enlighten the Supreme Council on the manner in which the Age of Consent Bill is likely to be received by us. It is therefore to be hoped that he will explain to the Council the glaring dissimilarity which exists between the opinions of the reformers and those of the general Hindu public in this presidency.

Mahomedans of Bombay and the Age of Consent Bill.

15. The Káside Mumbai (110), in its issue of the 11th February, while disapproving the Age of Consent Bill and advocating that social reform should proceed from within, observes that the draft memorial against Sir Andrew Scoble's Bill to be sent by the Anjumáne Váyáz Islám of Bombay has been submitted to an able barrister for his opinion, and that it is similar to the one adopted by the Hindu protesters against the Bill at the Mádhav Bág meeting of Sunday last.

Amendments in the Age of Consent Bill recommended.

16. A correspondent of the Gujaráti (82), in its issue of the 8th February, says that there are some grave defects in the Age of Consent Bill which should be removed before it is passed into law, and makes the following suggestions:—(1) There is no objection to fix the age of consent at twelve, provided consummation of marriage is permitted at attainment of puberty at any time earlier than the fixed limit. (2) An offence against the above provision should be punished with simple imprisonment for three months or a fine of about one thousand rupees or both. (3) The offender should be tried in a Sessions Court with a special jury composed of his castemen, whose decision may be considered final. [Several other newspapers of the week make similar suggestions and disapprove of the Bill as it stands.]

Age of Consent Bill condemned.

17. The Bhárat Bhrdta (141) and a correspondent of it, in its issue of the 6th February, observe that the Age of Consent Bill proposes inadvisable interference with the Hindu religion, that if the measure is passed into a law it would be an instrument for invading and exposing the sacred precincts of Hindu household life, and that more than three-fourths of the Hindu population condemn and oppose the measure, which, it is recommended, should be withdrawn and the reform desired by the Government should be left to be introduced by the Hindus themselves without any extraneous goading.

Disapproval of the Age of Consent Bill by the Válmik Káyasth community of Bombay.

18. The Native Opinion (16), in its issue of the 12th February, writes:—At a meeting of the Válmik Káyasth community held last Sunday at Bombay it was declared that the Age of Consent Bill directly interferes with the social and religious beliefs of the people, and that condemning the Bill they sympathised with the objects of the Mádhav Bág meeting. The declaration was signed by those present and forwarded to Ráo Bahádur Nána Moroji, chairman of the Mádhav Bág meeting.

19. The Mahratta (4), in its issue of the 8th February, writes:—Yesterday a meeting of the Shástris was held at Poona, when the following resolutions were passed among others:—(1) That the Garbhádhána ceremony must be performed immediately after the first sign of puberty according to Ashvaláyana and other authorities. (2) That in cases where the first sign of puberty appeared before twelve years, the present Bill, if passed into law, would come in the way of the performance of a practice ordered by religious authorities.

Opinion of the Shástris of Poona on the Age of Consent Bill.

20. The same newspaper arrives at the following conclusions on the subject of the Shastric aspect of the Age of Consent Bill:—(1) That Dr. Bhándárkar has misinterpreted Manu IX, 89, and Medhátithi thereon; Baudháyana IV, 1, 17; Gobhila-grihyaparishista 17, 18, 19; and above all the Ashvaláyana-grihyaparishista, which enjoins the Garbhádhána ceremony to be performed on the first attainment of puberty. (2) That his charge against the Hindu divines, of laying down a rule without a text to support it, is groundless. The Ashvaláyana-grihyasutra, properly understood, and the Ashvaláyana Smriti, fully support the views of these writers. (3) Thus viewed the Garbhádhána ceremony must be performed on the first course; and that intercourse on puberty days is mandatory before the birth of a son according to the unanimous opinion of all. (4) That though marriages after puberty may be allowed in certain exceptional cases and that non-intercourse on puberty-days is at times excusable, yet these very exceptions prove the rule and do not justify us in holding that the Bill, if passed, will cause no interference with our Shástras. (5) That this has been our Shástras and custom for over 2,500 years, whatever the medical writers might hold. (6) That the distinction between kámya and nitya duties can never justify Government interference, for the simple reason that it leads to such absurd conclusions as interference with marriage-laws, idol-worship, and so on.

Alleged misinterpretation of the Shastric texts in connection with the Age of Consent Bill.

21. The Native Opinion (16), in its issue of the 8th February, writes:—We have more than once said that unless both the opponents and advocates of the Age of Consent Bill agree upon puberty as the proper age of consent there is no way out of the difficulty. In this arrangement we obtain in the majority of cases two years at a stretch for the physical and even intellectual development of married and unmarried girls; but it is impossible to know why those who are in favour of the Bill should stick to twelve years as the one and only limit of age that would give them the sort of social relief they so persistently seek. Under the circumstances petitions and memorials are the order of the day, and controversy on the religious side of the question is now approaching almost the white heat. The last issue of the Poona Shivájí to hand lifts up the veil over the local Vakils' meeting in this connection, and gives us some idea of the way in which memorials may be got up. The first memorial adopted at the Vakils' meeting has the appearance, says that paper, of the general approval and sanction of the whole body of the Poona Vakils, but it now appears that the first memorial was approved of by only eleven members of that body. The protest signed by some twenty-eight other Vakils and published in the Shivájí will clearly show that the majority of Poona Vakils is not in favour of the Age of Consent Bill. These tactics are quite meaningless, and ought never to be resorted to by either party.

A way out of the difficulty in connection with the Age of Consent Bill suggested.

22. The Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 9th February, writes:—It will be seen from the summary of the views expressed by the District and the Divisional Officers in the Bengal Presidency that they may be regarded as advocating the fixing of the age of consent for the purpose of consummation of marriage, not by any arbitrary age-limit as the one proposed by the Bill, but by the natural limit indicated by the attainment of a certain physical condition. Such a provision would remove all the objections to the proposed measure on the ground of its interfering with religious usages. We cannot, however, conceal from ourselves the extreme probability of even such a measure as the one indicated above practically remaining a dead letter on the statute-book. But such a law, even though in practice it may prove quite inoperative, as it very probably will, may prove of considerable use by its educative influence on the future generations of the Indian people. Be that as it may, we are inclined to think that the Government of India is bound to cheerfully accept the suggested natural limit in preference to the arbitrary limit at present proposed, the more so because the suggested natural limit would be more in accord with the views expressed by the professional experts—we mean, the Public Health Society of Calcutta and the Medical Officers of the Bengal Presidency. The suggested natural limit would, moreover, give legal protection to a larger number of Native girls than the age limit now proposed.

The Age of Consent Bill and the opinion of the pleaders of Poona upon it.

23. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 8th February, writes:—We learn that the Age of Consent Bill was referred to members of the Poona bar for opinion and that a few members have expressed their approval of it. It is a matter of surprise that those who were asked to give their opinion did not call a general meeting of all the pleaders. However, some of those who had no opportunity of expressing their opinions given them, have published under their own signatures a letter in one of our vernacular contemporaries protesting against the manner in which about 11 pleaders only took upon themselves the responsibility of expressing approval of the Bill on behalf of all the pleaders. The signatures to this letter are 28 in number. We are sorry we cannot insert all their names here for want of space. We, however, suggest that these gentlemen should send their letter to the District Judge and a copy of it to the Bombay Government and to the honourable mover of the Bill.

The Mádhav Bág meeting at Bombay protesting against the Age of Consent Bill.

24. The Native Opinion (16), in its issue of the 12th February, congratulates the Hindu community on the meeting of a large number of Hindus held at Mádhav Bág, Bombay, on the 8th instant to protest against Sir Andrew Scoble's Age of Consent Bill, and says that the gentlemen who successfully worked hard to convene this large meeting deserve great credit for their patriotic efforts to enlighten Government as to the sense of the general public on the Bill. The proposed legislative measure, the paper believes, was introduced into the Council by the Viceroy simply because he could not stand the pressure brought to bear on him by the Secretary of State for India at the instigation of a handful of reformers, but now that a very strong protest has been adopted by a large number of Hindus of all sects and castes, who though patient, loyal and meek in other respects are very scrupulous about religious matters, Government will, it is hoped, think twice before passing into law a Bill like the present, which is not only useless but productive of much discontent. In conclusion, the paper recommends the Mahomedans to make common cause with the Hindus in protesting against the Bill as it affects all sections of the Indian public alike, and draws their attention to the uncertainty of religion being let alone, if once the principle of legislating according to the legislators' convictions recommended by Mr. Justice Telang is recognized and acted upon. [The Kesari (43), in its issue of the 10th idem, also thinks that the Mádhav Bág meeting was a great triumph of those who protest against the Bill over its supporters.]

The recent Mádhav Bág meeting in Bombay considered a farce.

25. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 9th February, writes:—Our self-glorifying patriots, our religious zealots, and their insane sheepish followers have had their game after all. A meeting, that was from the first advertized as "a monster meeting," was held last evening at Mádhav Bág, the usual place of demonstrative Hinduism. The meeting was strictly confined to those who agreed with the requisitionists in the view that the Bill was an interference with Hindu religion, and was thus not a public meeting at all. The promoters of the meeting deliberately excluded all discussion, and they had probably very good reason for doing so. The whole business seems to be a shady concern from beginning to end. In the long list of the requisitionists, some ninety, there are not more than a dozen names which are known to the public. The rest have yet to prove their title to fame. In this list of the leaders of the Hindu community there are some, we are told, who have hardly yet emerged from the school-room. The bulk of the "monster" audience was composed of Bhátias, to whom a word from their headmen to muster strong was enough to bring them in thousands. These men may be good businessmen, but are not particularly discriminating in other matters. Some of the headmen themselves have shown precious little strength of conviction in this matter. Mr. Dámodar Thákersey Mulji and Mr. Vrandávandás Purushottamdás, two of the requisitionists, were present at the various meetings held at Mr. Telang's house, and had expressed themselves unequivocally that the twelve years' limit would be salutary. The tactics used to bring together such a motley crowd as met yesterday were, we have good reason to think, very questionable. Deliberate misrepresentation was freely resorted to. The fears of the ignorant were worked upon with threats of police oppression, and with making marriage itself illegal below twelve. Both at private houses and at the place of the meeting this misrepresentation was freely going on for the purpose of obtaining signatures. In the meeting itself there was not a little of the playing to the gallery and distortion of facts. There was such a tumult and noise that persons within a few yards of the chairman and other speakers were absolutely unable to hear anything, and an orthodox friend assures us that he was by no means the wiser for going to the meeting. It was in fact a show, a noisy farce, in which certain proceedings previously concocted were re-enacted in the view of an ignorant crowd. A memorial was adopted, which, considering that there was to be no discussion at the meeting, might have been more easily done by getting the signatures from door to door. There would probably be a multitude of signatures going up, but in weighing them Government will do well to bear in mind the circumstances under which they were obtained. The meeting only serves to proclaim the folly of our community that it wants to brand itself as a most sensual people in the name of religion, and that it seeks to protect that religion under the leadership of men who are every day of their life breaking its most solemn commandments.

26. In noticing the proceedings of the meeting at Mádhav Bág, which was held for the purpose of adopting a memorial to the Government of India against the Age of Consent Bill, on the alleged ground that raising the age of consent would interfere with the time-honoured customs and religion of the Hindus, the Bombay Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 10th February, says:—So far as number was concerned the meeting was successful, but the proceedings held at it were very defective. No attempt whatever was made to hold a discussion on the important question so as to acquaint the assembled people with the grounds for and against raising the age; nor, considering the meeting to be of such persons only as objected to the measure, were any grounds advanced in support of the opposition. All that could be gathered from the meeting was that the feeling of the assembled people was against the Bill.

27. In writing on the same subject, the Jáme Jamshed (107), in its issue of the same date, says:—Like other opponents of the Bill the meeting could not show that there was anything wrong in the measure, which is admitted by all parties to represent the good intentions of Government, and everybody concedes that the age of consent should be raised as much as possible in the interests of humanity. Three main objections have been taken against the Bill, namely, (1) that it interferes with Hindu religious practices; (2) that if the Bill be allowed to be passed into law the Government would be encouraged to make further interference with Hindu social practices, producing thereby much evil in Hindu society; and (3) that the Bill in the form of law would prove in the mofussil particularly an instrument for persecution of unoffending families in the hands of their enemies. The third objection is rather serious. Mr. Nána Moroji, the president of the meeting, who had served as a Magistrate for twenty-eight years in different places in this presidency, also expressed serious fears on the same account, and the stubborn opposition received by the Bill from the Hindus is due mainly to this objection. As regards the second objection, Government will not mischievously interfere with the social customs of the Hindus, and a solemn assurance ought to be conveyed to that effect by His Excellency the Viceroy. The first objection cannot stand in the face of the diverse disadvantages of early consummation of marriage, and needs no serious discussion.

28. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 8th February, writes:—

A suggestion to Government in connection with public meetings against the Age of Consent Bill.

There is one suggestion which we should like to make to the Government. Ever since the Ilbert Bill agitation, our people have come to believe that there is some magic in public meetings and public demonstrations; and when, therefore, they cannot get up real public meetings and demonstrations, they magnify their little make-believes and send spicy telegrams to the newspapers. There are few publicists who are not aware that this trick is often resorted to. We therefore ask Government to notify that, in future, no representation will be attended to unless the names and callings of the persons attending such meetings and demonstrations are certified. The hollowness of several so-called public movements will then become apparent. We are led to make this suggestion by what we find is now taking place in some parts of Bengal. A meeting was recently called by Calcutta anti-reformers in Sabba Bazar, and it has been given out that from two to three thousand people attended it. A correspondent, however, writes to the Daily News as follows: "It is reported that from two to three thousand people were there. Is the reporter aware of the capacity of that quadrangle where the meeting was held? There were only 400 chairs, and the people who were standing all round would, at the highest, not exceed one hundred." Now whom is the Government to believe? How is it to know to what classes the two or three thousand or the four hundred people belonged?

PART III.—Education.

29. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 8th February, writes:—

Proposed change in the system of recruiting Professors for Government colleges disapproved.

The Times of India a few days ago hinted that the India Office were contemplating a radical change in the method by which professorial service in India is at present recruited. It is believed that they want to give up the present system of full service and introduce what may be called the short-service system. The evils of that system in the army organization of India have become sufficiently plain both from the point of efficiency and economy, and we do not know whether the evils in the educational system attendant thereon will not be infinitely worse. Even at present, with all the prospects of promotion and pension, it is daily becoming more and more difficult to find proper men for proper places, except it be in the Sanskrit department, as the Times facetiously remarks. Do the India Office authorities seriously think that that evil will be minimised by making that service still less attractive? The five-year Professor will naturally act as a mere mercenary, even granting that he is a competent one. He will always be looking back to his country and will necessarily look upon himself as a mere bird of passage. Of responsibility he will feel next to nothing. And what about the great advantages that students derive from the moral influence of a Professor of long standing and of lengthy, meritorious and honest service, which were lately dwelt upon by His Excellency Lord Harris at the departure of Dr. Wordsworth? The people as well as the authorities ought to lose no time in protesting against such a stupid and ruinous change with all their might and main. The India Office might certainly afford to be less mischievous in its acts of interference, if not more useful in those of initiation.

30. The Native Opinion (16), in its issue of the 12th February, writes:—

Proposed abolition of the Matriculation Examination disapproved.

We have been all along aware of the complaints that have been rife for some time past on the score of the inability of the students entering the colleges after satisfying the Matriculation test to follow the lectures delivered there; but we never thought that the cavillers would in such a short time go so far as to advocate the abolition of the examination altogether. On the contrary, the establishment of a separate examination for qualification for the public service gave grounds for the belief that the examination in question would be altered in such a way as to serve its real purpose of preparing candidates for higher culture in our colleges. But now this belief is proved to have been mistaken, for the test is proposed to be done away with altogether and the function of admission into the colleges is to be solely left to the college staff. Now, we say, this is a most undesirable provision. We are not desirous of questioning the allegations of the Professors, although there may be another side to the picture. Some outspoken critic may ask, has not the quality of the teaching of the Professors deteriorated? Have we got real Professors fully acquainted with the art of instilling knowledge into the minds of the pupils, and, taking for granted that the quality of the students has degenerated, has not that of the teachers gone the same way? Then, why condemn the students alone? We are not going to enter into this unpleasant discussion, although we think that this view is not groundless. What we urge is that the abolition of the examination and giving the power of admission into colleges to their Professors will be mischievous in the end. We think that higher education, looking to the attitude of Government towards it, will be in danger; for, having such an arbitrary power in its hands, what is there to prevent it from seeing that very few students are admitted into its colleges? The standard of admission will also vary in different colleges and the whole affair will be full of uncertainty. There will moreover be considerable room for jobbery and favouritism, and this will particularly be so in the case of rival private colleges. The plea that similar procedure obtains in Oxford and Cambridge is not conclusive in this country where circumstances are different. Our Universities have been, besides, modelled after the one in London where there is an entrance examination. There is a similar test yet in Calcutta, Madras and Allahabad. So we are of opinion that the proposed change will be a revolutionary one and unsuited to the circumstances of the country. While we say this much, let it not be understood that we are for the retention of the examination in its present form. We go so far as to say that if it is found wanting for the purposes of collegiate education, let it be reformed so as to make it answer its original object, but let it not be abolished altogether. By all means make the changes that may seem advisable. The standard has been often changed formerly and it may be changed once more. But what we hold is that instead of leaving it to the college staff to admit students, let the University retain the key in its own hands as a body independent of all colleges. Let it alone provide a pass which it will not be in the power of anybody to question, no matter what value it sets upon it.

Reform, instead of abolition, of the Matriculation Examination recommended.

31. The Mahrátta (4) in its issue of the 8th February, writes:—The Vice-Chancellor's speech at the last Convocation was expository rather than didactical. It foreshadowed several changes, some of which might be welcomed with satisfaction, while others seem to be of doubtful utility. For instance, Government will not be acting a day too soon in setting its Law School on a satisfactory basis. It is a grave scandal that, while every other branch of learning is adequately provided, the one branch which has to do most with the manufacturing of those on whom the security of life and property of the people mainly depends, is left almost in a state of chaos. Mr. Justice Birdwood did well in emphasizing the urgency and importance of such a reform. He next referred to the probable abolition of the Matriculation Examination by the University and the delegation of that work to the several colleges concerned. No doubt, for several reasons the present test is unsatisfactory, not the least of which is the defective machinery employed to conduct the examination. We doubt the wisdom, in the first place, of practically doing away with a question on paraphrase by making it optional. That evil, however, is much more aggravated by taking it for granted that all the examiners in English,—generally all Europeans,—are competent to examine translations into English from any language in the world. The test, consequently, as far as English is concerned, became very faulty, at least of a doubtful character. To add to this, there is no uniformity of test. We think much ground for complaint would be removed by improving these defects of machinery, if possible. But we doubt whether the leaving of the task to the various colleges would be an improvement upon the present system. It will be, no doubt, very convenient to the college authorities, but to the candidates themselves and to the various schools that bring them up, it will be anything but a bed of roses. That want of uniformity of standard against which so many complaints have been justly raised will be aggravated by leaving it to the sweet will of the heads of the various colleges to apply any test they like from year to year. The students as well as the teachers will be at sea to know what to learn and teach, and what to avoid; the various colleges will naturally apply various tests, the wants of the Medical College, for instance, being altogether different from those of the Engineering College. How to satisfy the various demands of these various colleges will prove almost a desperate problem for the responsible heads of secondary institutions to solve. There is another difficulty. What provision can be made, we ask, for those candidates who wish to pass the Matriculation simply to be permitted to appear for the pleaders' examination? For these and many other reasons the University authorities, we trust, will think well before going in for such a wholesale change. Let them take care that they do not thereby add to the difficulties of the students and thus check ultimately that spread of education on which the Vice-Chancellor dwelt with so much apparent satisfaction and pride, and which is so essential from many points of view. Another change which the speech foreshadowed was with regard to the possible increase of fees for permission to appear at various examinations, with a view to enable the University to stand upon its own legs financially. The object, no doubt, is a very laudable one, but we doubt whether the means sought to employ are equally wise and safe. The rates of fees already are sufficiently high, taking the pecuniary ability of the majority of candidates into consideration. The authorities cannot too often be reminded that, unfortunately for their exchequer, the majority of the candidates come of comparatively poor parents. If the financial position is therefore sought to be improved, they must look in other directions than this. Private benefactions may here find a very legitimate object, and, frankly speaking, we do not see any great objection to the local Government continuing its assistance for an indefinite period. Much saving might also be effected by restoring the rule of not admitting a candidate to the Matriculation or the School Final Examination unless he produces a certificate of fitness from the head of some recognised institution. Looking to the extremely small proportion in which private candidates generally pass, it is a mere waste of money, both to the University and the ignorant and poor parents of the raw candidates, to allow them to appear simply to satisfy their curiosity as to what an examination looks like. We do not know why this obnoxious departure is not yet departed from, unless it be that the wheels of the University move too slowly.

32. In alluding to the serious accident that occurred on the 5th instant at the level crossing near the Mahálakshmi Station, Bombay, of the B. B. &. C. I. Railway, the Gujaráti (88), in its issue of the 8th February, reminds Government to compel this and the G. I. P. Railway Company to construct overbridges at the several level crossings of their respective lines in the city, particularly near the Churney Road and Marine Lines Stations, where, on some Hindu holidays, traffic becomes unusually large, causing great fear of serious accidents occurring on these occasions.

PART V.—Municipalities.

His Excellency the Viceroy's reply to the Municipal Corporation, Bombay, refusing interview with the proposed deputation in connection with the Tansa loan, approved.

33. In noticing the reply received by the Municipal Corporation of Bombay from His Excellency the Viceroy, refusing interview with the proposed deputation for expounding reasons why the repayment of the Tansa loan should be spread over a period of sixty years, the Bombay Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 11th February, says:—

The reply shows that the reasons which induced the Corporation to ask permission for a deputation were not sufficiently strong, and that His Excellency thought that an interview would be a simple waste of his valuable time. Lord Lansdowne has been, however, courteous enough to inform the Corporation that any further representations which may be forwarded through the usual channels will receive full consideration, and this consolatory intimation also means that the reasons hitherto advanced for altering the decision of the Government of India on the subject have not been sound enough to induce His Excellency to do so. The Viceregal reply is in the present state of things quite appropriate, and is an indirect intimation to the Corporation to economize the lavish expenditure it has been of late incurring, lest it should bring itself to the verge of insolvency; and it is to be hoped that this sound advice will be at once adopted by the Corporation.

Comments on the refusal of His Excellency the Viceroy to receive a deputation from the Bombay Municipal Corporation in connection with the terms of the Tansa loan.

34. In noticing the same reply, the Jáme Jamshed (107), in its issue of the 11th February, says:—This is the first occasion on which a rebuff of this kind has been received by a large Corporation in this country. How it will be received by the Bombay Corporation we will not venture to say, and in what manner it will be received by all the large Corporations in India we can only conjecture. That it will effectually prevent all further requests from Indian Corporations to be allowed on appropriate occasions to discuss personally with the Viceroy such matters as affect finance and sanitary progress may be anticipated. We have said appropriate occasions, because we venture to think the subject of a loan of a kror and a half of rupees like the Tansa loan, which the Government of India insists shall be repaid in a period of forty years, is a most appropriate subject for personal discussion. But in this land of red-tape, where all things are done with the pen and decided by the pen, any attempt to simplify proceedings by viva voce communication meets only with discouragement. Chambers of Commerce may occasionally be admitted to the favour of an audience, but Municipal Corporations cannot pretend to the same indulgence. In the absence of representative Legislative Councils in India the people have no road to obtain redress except by the tedious and uncertain process of the pen. The pen is an instrument which is supposed to possess the most complete power of explanation. This we take leave to doubt, and the Bombay Corporation is of this opinion; hence the request to be permitted to send a deputation of their best members to Calcutta. The Government of India have placed themselves in an awkward position by the way in which they have accorded their sanction to the Tansa loan. They first gave sanction to the raising of a loan of forty-seven lákhs of rupees to run for sixty years, and when application was made for raising a second instalment of the same loan, the period of duration of this moiety was made to run for forty years. We gather two things from this arrangement: (1) that the Government of India grant power to raise municipal loan without any fixed rules, showing that it is all a matter of favour, and (2) that Government are not sure of their own ground and are liable to decide one question in two different ways. Now it is this deviation in procedure which has upset all the calculations of the Corporation in regard to the Tansa loan and brought about all the trouble of which the Corporation justly complain. It may be presumed that the Viceroy is unwilling to be hackled with questions on this matter at close quarters. Firing at very long range and using the pen in preference to the voice is thought to be the most prudent way of proceeding. It is the financial advisers of the Government of India who persuaded the Viceroy to sanction the raising of two parts of one loan to run for two different periods. The Bombay Chamber of Commerce aided the Bombay Corporation in pointing out the inconvenience of the arrangement. But by the time the Chamber's opinion reached Calcutta the "orders" about the loan were issued, and having been issued the Government of India consider them unalterable. How would it have been if instead of the Bombay Corporation asking the Viceroy to receive a deputation about the Tansa loan the public of Bombay had sent forward a request to receive its deputation after a public meeting had been called? Would the requisitionists have met with the rebuff administered to the Bombay Corporation? The question is worth considering at the present time. The truth of the whole matter is, as we have said at the beginning of this article, that India is utterly unrepresented over the length and breadth of this great empire, and because of this want of representation it necessarily suffers in its own best interests. The decision of the Viceroy to decline to receive the Bombay Corporation except with the pen will create no little surprise in all the intelligent and educated centres of British India.

35. Writing on the recent Government resolution on the Poona Municipality, the Mahratta (4), in its issue of the 8th February, says:—From what we know of the whole case, we think the principal contention of the Poona Municipality is that they are prepared to admit mistakes and are willing to correct them. They are ready to listen to suggestions about reform, and, means and circumstances permitting, to carry them out also. Government in their resolution have shown a commendable desire to leave the moral reputation of the body unsullied, and they have also given expression to their feelings of confidence in the intelligence and capacity of the ratepayers of the city. Within the last two years Government were pleased to give two certificates of good zeal and capacity to the ratepayers, and with these votes of confidence in our hands, it is foolish to fear that Government is inclined to wrest from us the privilege of self-government. In our last article we have shown that the intervention of Government at the instance of the "city fathers" and the public of Poona successfully warded off the dangers of official conspiracy, and there is little doubt that the present danger too will vanish within a few days. We, however, learn with regret that in influential circles in Poona moderation is mistaken for submission and respectful protest for an humble explanation. The citizens have till now very properly held themselves aloof; but immediately they find that their representatives are prepared to compromise the dignity of their position, they will give them up as lost and take up the matter in their own hands and fight for their honour. As we have noticed, the fight is not between Government and the municipality, neither is it between Government and the people. It is between a small circle of disappointed and offended officials and non-officials on the one hand, and Government policy and the honest and willing supporters of it on the other. These people rely for their support on misrepresentation. The first shot fired by these opponents of local self-government was when in a secret and confidential report to Government the Collector represented that during the elections a good deal of corruption had been resorted to, and not anticipating that there was anything behind it Government passed their resolution upon it. When this was brought to the notice of the municipality they recorded their regret. At the time neither they nor the Government could discover that it was only the forerunner of a cleverly laid out plot against the municipality. The secret report about corruption at election had already paved the ground, and a theory was set up, of course privately, that those who went into the municipality by buying their seats must be recouping themselves; and a few busy-bodies who had made it their sole end and aim to discredit the municipal administration went about their task of misrepresentation in right earnest. When the mine had been properly laid, a secret inquiry was got to be commenced, and the result of all this kind of work in the dark is embodied in the Collector's letter. All the attempts at throwing dirt upon the good name of the municipality, however, did not succeed, and Lord Reay's eulogy of the municipal administration of Poona was a gag in the mouth of all traducers. But a few days more and the mischief-making was commenced over again. The tone of correspondence became discourteous, interference became more frequent, secret reports began to be made, and finally the Collector abdicated all his power in favour of the City Magistrate. The City Magistrate is a member of the municipality, and as such he is not competent to sit in judgment upon the actions of the body. But the Collector would not care to mind any rules. He would not exercise his powers of control and allowed himself to be guided by the advice of those in whose judgment the public of Poona have but little faith. The municipality resented such treatment, but he was deaf to all requests; and matters have gone to such a length that Government too has now placed itself in such a position that it is naturally charged as being a party to this conspiracy against self-government in Poona. A local contemporary has given out that papers speaking favourably of the municipality were looked upon as if they were non est, and that a resolution dealing out even-handed justice to both the parties to the strife was passed but did not see the light of day. For such a state of public feeling Government has only to thank itself.

Government officials and their alleged attempts to discredit the Poona Municipality.

Poona Municipality and Government.

36. While writing about the Poona Municipality, the Shri Shiváji (64), in its issue of the 6th February, says:—There is a very curious matter talked of regarding the Poona Municipality, though the means of proving it have disappeared. When Mr. East, the late Collector of Poona, made an unfavourable report on the municipality after an ex-parte and superficial enquiry Mr. Grant was Commissioner, C. D., who in spite of Mr. East's report wrote a letter to Government in favour of the municipality, and it is said that Government passed a resolution favourable to the Corporation. In the meantime Mr. Grant gave over charge to Mr. East and then the first resolution was left in the back-ground and a new resolution, which is so much complained of, was issued. This is said to be the case by persons who know the truth. This incident plainly shows that Commissioners and Collectors regulate the conduct of Governors and higher authorities.

Government resolution on the Poona Municipality criticized.

37. The Gujaráti (82), in its issue of the 8th February, writes:—When the Bombay Government issued their resolution condemning the Poona Municipality on account of certain alleged irregularities which were set forth at length in that document, the public naturally believed that Government had not acted the part of a biassed partisan. We were, however, wrong in that belief along with the entire English and Native press. From the explanation that has been given by two of the members of the managing committee who were mentioned by name in the resolution, it appears that Government never cared to call upon the municipality to explain the charges levelled against them and took for gospel one-sided official statements made by Mr. East. We are glad to hear that a strong representation is going to be made to the Bombay Government on the subject. This is the only way to defeat the attempt now being made by some one unknown to the public to discredit a civic body which is next in importance to the Bombay Municipality in this presidency. The extreme haste shown by Government in publishing a very damaging resolution without giving the party concerned full opportunity to explain the charges is highly reprehensible. The incident has taught the public not to believe unreservedly in Government resolutions, and has also shown the danger of relying upon confidential official reports. It is very easy for self-satisfied critics to attack the Native press for their alleged misrepresentations and teach them the duties and responsibilities of criticism. The four canons of criticism which Mr. Lee-Warner laid down for the edification of the critics of Government are, we believe, also applicable to official critics, and it is certainly a pity that the present Government, whose policy more than that of any other administration is expected to be in consonance with those canons of criticism, should have drawn up an indictment against an important municipal body in almost utter disregard of those very principles. We earnestly hope our Poona friends will come out of the ordeal free from all the grave imputations which would have completely discredited the cause of local self-government in this presidency if they had been at all well founded.

1. The Berár Samáchár (3), in its issue of the 9th February, writes:—

The limit of age of consent fixed in the Bill considered too low and 16 years recommended in its place.

We disapprove of the advocacy of the Bill increasing the age of consent on the ground that it asks too little and for that little it shakes to their foundations the very trust and confidence of the public in the Government. If Sati was abolished at one stroke of legal interference, let the Government prohibit the consummation of marriage before the age of sixteen, and India will justly be proud of the British rule in raising the age of consent to such an extent as no nation has yet reached. Legislation is indeed a most effective instrument for modifying as well as intensifying public opinion in the direction in which it is desirable that it should progress. The Natives, being very loyal, are certain to obey the law even if their life be at stake; and in the present case the claims of humanity will indeed sanctify even strict legislation, though it may be bitterly felt. Dr. K. R. Kirtikar was the first to give expression to such candid and liberal views as command our urgent consideration.

2. The Vaidarbh (2), in its issue of the 7th February, writes:—Amráoti is quite excited over the Age of Consent Bill. Till now three meetings have been held to discuss and pronounce an opinion on the Bill. Opinion there is divided; but it is a matter of congratulation that the majority of persons who have received higher education are in favour of the Bill. There is an opposition to the Bill, which, so far as number is concerned, may well call itself powerful. But mere counting of heads has absolutely no significance. What is to be seen is whether the majority of persons who by their study, culture and knowledge are qualified to pronounce an opinion on this matter are in favour of the measure or against it. And it is really satisfactory to see that the majority of educated men at Amráoti are for a measure which is supported by considerations of humanity. The opposition to the Bill is headed by some men of education; and if they are to be considered responsible for the leaflets calling people to attend their great mass meetings, all we can say is that this is to be greatly regretted. To spread far and wide leaflets bearing on them inflammatory appeals like "Danger to Religion," "Violate your religion or suffer transportation for life," "Interference of Government in domestic delicate matters," is not only to prevent a proper consideration and discussion of the subject, but to rouse passions which might cause serious embarrassment to Government. Perhaps, the mischievous tendencies of these placards and leaflets never entered the imagination of the organizers. It may, by the bye, be asked, how many of those who issued the leaflets adhere to the principles of Hinduism as it is accepted now?

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Expression of satisfaction at Lord Cross's India Councils Bill.

1. With reference to the India Councils Bill now before Parliament, the Rást Goftár (86), in its issue of the 15th February, writes:—A recognition in Lord Cross's Bill of the elective principle, to be worked within safe and reasonable limits, would have been very acceptable to this country. It might have been granted without subverting the foundations of Government. But we are not disposed, like some of our contemporaries, for that reason, to hurl anathemas at Lord Cross's bantling as fit for nothing. They consider that the Bill, without the elective principle, is like a body without the soul. We, however, venture to think that it will go some way towards improving the present constitution of the Indian Councils. Lord Cross's Bill will give, among other things, a larger number of representative men to the Councils. We say representative men, although nomination will continue to be the mode of selection. It may be a heresy to say so, but our faith is not very great in the wonders which the elective franchise is supposed to work. We do not think that election will always secure good men, or that nomination will supply bad ones. We do not even think that in India the elective franchise will be a guarantee that it will result in the return of better men to the Councils than ever the system of nomination can. The power of nomination is being exercised every year with greater care. Judging from our experience of recent years, we may safely say that the days of dummies are over. The force of public opinion has now grown too great to tolerate them in the exalted position of legislators. The practice of nominating the president of the Chamber of Commerce to the Council is a sort of indirect recognition of the elective principle. We need not, therefore, despair of any good resulting from the system of nomination. It is working fairly well and will work better, though the wish is nevertheless there that a small step might well have been taken in the direction of allowing the right of election with proper safeguards.

Lord Cross's Bill for leave to high officials in India disapproved.

2. In alluding to the Bill introduced by Lord Cross for allowing certain high Indian officials to go to England on certain occasions without vacating their posts, the Jáme Jamshed (107), in its issue of the 18th February, says:—The existing rule of not permitting these officials to visit England without first resigning their posts has been in force for many years, and no complaint worth noticing has ever been raised against it. On the other hand, it has been a standing complaint that the five years' term of office in the case of these officials is very short, since on the expiry of the term the officers who have collected the necessary experience have to vacate their offices, and their absence on leave for two or three periods would make matters worse. There is as much fear of an acting incumbent not doing any important work as there is of his upsetting the arrangements made by the permanent occupier. A courteous Secretary of State is not likely to refuse leave of absence to a Viceroy, Governor or any of the other high officials specified in the Bill, who would put forward such excuses as continued indisposition, or private affairs, or a personal interview with the India Office for a settlement of a public matter. Thus these high officials might be enabled to visit England at the time of the general elections to advance their own or their party's interests. And for this leave of absence the poor Indian treasury will have to bear additional burden. It is to be regretted that the political associations of the country, whose duty it is to protest against such measures as Lord Cross's present Bill, should have grown indolent, leaving their own work to be done by the Indian National Congress. [The Hitechchhu (84) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 19th February, expresses similar sentiments.]

The desire of the Manchester manufacturers to curtail the working hours in Indian mills disapproved.

3. In noticing the statement made by Sir John Gorst in a speech recently made at Chatham on the labour question, that he generally favoured State intervention for the protection of labour, and thought that Government might intervene to prevent overwork in the Indian mills, the Bombay Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 16th February, says:—

Through a selfish desire to crush the Indian cotton industry the cotton manufacturers of Lancashire put pressure upon the authorities in England to abolish the cotton import duties, inflicting thereby a heavy loss on the Indian treasury, but this had very little effect on the Indian industry. Failing to secure their selfish object by this measure, a fanciful complaint was brought forward by the Manchester cotton dealers that the Indian mill-hands had been overworked, and pressure was brought to bear upon the Indian Government to appoint a Factory Commission to enquire into the condition of these workmen. A Commission was appointed, which after taking evidence of the mill-hands has satisfactorily proved that the labourers are not overworked at all, and that if their working hours were curtailed their interests would be prejudiced. An attempt is now being made by the Manchester manufacturers to discredit the Commission's report, and to induce Government to pass a law curtailing the working hours, by alleging that the workmen did not know the value of health, which they were injuring by overwork, and that there were no medical men on the Commission to properly consider the question of health. Mr. Maclean's motion in Parliament to have a law curtailing the working hours and Sir John Gorst's statement mentioned above that the Home Government are inclined to humour the Manchester manufacturers, lead one to fear that a law is likely to be passed; and if one is passed, the condition of the mill-hands would surely grow worse. [The Akhbáre Sodágar (91), in its issue of the 20th February, expresses similar sentiments.]

Early enactment of an amended Indian Factory Act prayed for.

4. A correspondent of the Jáme Jamshed (107), in its issue of the 19th February, says that since the report submitted to Government by the Indian Factory Commission has been approved by the public on account of its containing recommendations the adoption of which would be beneficial to mill-hands as well as the mill-owners, there is no good reason why the incorporation of those recommendations into a Bill and enacting it at once as an amended Factory Act should be delayed, that the mill-hands are anxiously waiting for the enactment of a new law, and that it is to be hoped that it will come into force before the 1st of April next, since the mill-hands are in particular need of protection in the hot season of the year.

The limits of the working hours of children in Indian mills should be fixed as recommended by the Indian Factory Commission and not as suggested by the Berlin Labour Conference.

5. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 20th February, says:—Lord Cross's desire, announced the other day in the House of Commons by Mr. W. H. Smith, that the limits of work for children employed in Indian mills should be in accordance with the recommendation of the Berlin Labour Conference, should not be submitted to, because the condition of the Indian labourers was not considered by the Conference. The Indian Factory Commission properly thought over the actual condition of the labourers and has submitted their recommendations, which ought to be adopted. It is to be hoped that the Government of India will soon pass an amended Factory Act, adopting all the recommendations of the Commission.

Price of overland post cards.

6. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 15th February, writes:—When the postage on overland letters was four annas and a half the overland post card cost one anna and a half; but now that the former has been reduced to two annas and a half, must the latter remain the same as before? Do the authorities intend to discourage the use of post cards?

A complaint against the Postal Department.

7. The Jouhar (150), in its issue of the 6th February, says:—A post card addressed in Urdu to the manager of this paper was delivered to him at Bombay ten days after it was posted at Lahore. It appears from the remark written on the address side of the post card while in transit that the postal employés could not make out the address owing to their ignorance of the language. When such was the case with a letter addressed to a well-known newspaper office, God knows whether letters addressed in Urdu to ordinary people are destroyed or thrown away by the Postal Department. Such neglect is simply due to a scarcity of Mahomedan or Urdu-knowing clerks in the Postal Department.

PART II.—Legislation.

A recommendation to remove an anomaly in the Penal Code for the punishment of what cannot consistently be called rape as between husband and wife.

8. The Gujarátí (82), in its issue of the 15th February, quotes from the New York Philanthropist a list of the age of consent in the United States, and says:—From the list it will be seen that the limit of 10 years is recognised by law in nine States as against a stranger. In England, though marriages are generally postponed to ages ranging from 16 to 25, 12 is the minimum marriageable age of girls according to the English common law, but consummation of marriage at that period would not be "rape" or even any offence at all. Under the Penal Code of England carnal knowledge of a girl below 13, with or without her consent, by a stranger, is known as "rape," but if the girl is under 16, it is punished as "misdemeanour." There is little doubt that the penal law of India is in principle defective, in so far as it ignores the relations of husband and wife which spring up immediately after the marriage ceremony is completed. There are very sound reasons for giving protection to immature girls, but to punish a husband for rape on his wife is to introduce inconsistent and confusing doctrines into the criminal jurisprudence of the country. The existing anomaly can be easily removed by seizing the present opportunity of the introduction of the Age of Consent Bill to insert an independent section for the punishment of what cannot consistently be called rape as between husband and wife, if the marriage of the couple is recognized as valid and legal for all purposes whatsoever. The introduction of a separate section, as was suggested by Sir Maxwell Melvill, providing a lighter punishment than that for a ruffian or a stranger, with other proper safeguards which have been proposed in course of the controversy in connection with the Age of Consent Bill, ought to satisfy all parties, and we hope the Legislature will bestow the fullest consideration on the suggestions that have been made in various quarters on the subject.

Necessity for passing the Age of Consent Bill in spite of the strong opposition to it.

9. The Subodh Patrika (18), in its issue of the 15th February, writes:—Independently of the fate of the Age of Consent Bill—we may observe, while passing, that the Government is bound to pass it unless it is to abdicate its protective functions,—the spectacle presented by the opposition is calculated to suggest a melancholy reflection. The Bill is the most moderate and, as it is now framed, the most unobjectionable measure that could be adopted, and being a protective measure falls far short of the aims which the people for more than half a century have generally professed. Again, the injunctions of the Shástras are universally disregarded in more ways than one by heterodox and orthodox alike and everybody is conscious of it, as also of the fact that those injunctions, while conflicting, are not unfavourable to the change, and where they prescribe hurtful or inhuman rites they have been set aside by the Government in the past. Certainly, all the so-called higher classes are aware of all this. Yet suddenly the cry of religion in danger is raised by intelligent men, and by misrepresentation ignorant crowds are gathered together and made to sign protests, when the Bill only aims at checking a dastardly and degrading custom which any race of men above the savage state ought to be ashamed to own. Either the people are incapable of really understanding and appreciating this simple matter which concerns themselves, or they dishonestly blink at it or are taught to do so. Can such people be considered qualified to understand and appreciate, and still less safely to receive and exercise, rights of freedom and political life entirely foreign to their ideas and their country, merely because a microscopic minority among them have been enabled by a foreign Government to attain to a knowledge of those rights and that life? This question would remain untouched if this educated minority were entirely arranged on the side of the Bill. But the actual fact aggravates it still further. We shall not pursue this reflection further, but will only ask the reader to say whether those who are leading the opposition are friends or foes of their country and their countrymen, and whether they are lengthening or shortening the road to the political millenium for which all of us burn with the fire of enthusiasm. Those who suggest that indications of puberty instead of an age-limit should be the basis of the Age of Consent Bill do not remember that that test would not only be uncertain but would also lead to indelicate investigations naturally repulsive to female modesty, whereas the question of age can be settled by means of registration and such other helps. Again, the same people are found to urge that the 12 years' limit would bring down the practice of consummation to that year, whereas in the majority of cases now it is much above that period. This is an absurd contention. The law would only prevent it up to 12, but would leave full liberty to defer it beyond that limit; so there is no reason why people among whom the ceremony is performed after 12 should bring it down to that age. Curiously enough, the contention that the new law would remain as much a dead letter as the old has been, proceeds from the same side which ascribes so much virtue and power to the former. There is really nothing to object to in the Bill. Rajputs, than whom there could be no class of Hindus more honestly orthodox, have adopted 14 as the age of marriage for girls. What objection then can there be to prohibiting its consummation below 12? It will protect tender girls from debilitating and demoralising treatment. The religious objection is brought forward only, and can serve only, to deceive strangers. Those, therefore, among whom this protection to tender girls does not exist ought to accept the Bill with gratitude. But it is precisely those among whom the disgusting practice exists that are the most barefacedly obstinate in their opposition to the Bill—the Bengalis, educated ones too, who, as if to enhance the climax, put forth the plea that this is so because the Legislative Council is not representative of their views! We are glad that Western India, despite a few individuals here and there who weakly succumbed to astute Bengali guidance, no doubt in the belief that it was true patriotism, has shown more creditable attitude. This is partly due to our partial freedom from the disgraceful custom which enslaved Bengal, and partly also to the Mádhav Bág meeting of 1886, the proceedings of which exploded the delusion that efforts could proceed from within to uproot such evil customs, and thus that movement has served the very cause it was intended to thwart. But we trust our educated men will not be content with this negative attitude, but will speak out collectively in favour of the small measure which Government has brought in the performance of its own duty of protecting helpless minor girls, and which incidentally is calculated to do some good to our society.

10. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 15th February, writes:—The duty of the Government of India with regard to the Age of Consent Bill is very plain. It ought to see the hollowness of the agitation. It ought to see the absurdity of the arguments set up. It ought to see that the great concession made in rendering the offence non-cognizable is not at all appreciated, or totally ignored. It ought to see that the men who are opposing it deserve no concession. It should take the provisions of its own laws into consideration, and should rather try to increase the age-limit than whittle it down by the "puberty" clause proposed by the so-called orthodox party, who do not know what puberty really means. Medical writers tell us of cases in which the physical condition talked of ad nauseam in Bengal does not appear at all. They tell us of cases in which women became mothers without ever attaining that condition, and of other cases in which girls of eight or nine had reached this condition. The Legislature is bound to prevent as far as possible all indecent inquiries. The Judges and the Magistrates have fairly worked the numerous age clauses in the Penal Code. The proposed measure is in harmony with the Code; the amendment suggested is not. But there is another amendment which may well be made, and that is that intercourse with a girl under 14 should be prohibited altogether. In England intercourse with a girl under 16, though not a felony, is a misdemeanour. The Legislature here may well make intercourse with a girl over 12 and under 14 a misdemeanour. It may provide imprisonment for a year or two as punishment for this misdemeanour. The Bill as it stands, with this addition, would be a truly protective measure. It would have a far more deterrent and educative effect than it can now have. We know some Bengalis would oppose this amendment, though, as Mr. Nulkar says, if this law had been enacted in 1860 there would have been no opposition. The Legislature does not consider a girl under 16 years ripe enough to judge whether she should abandon her guardian. It does not consider her sufficiently mature to give a valid consent to her being disposed of by her father as a prostitute. Is it not anomalous that the same Legislature should consider a girl of 12 years competent to consent to sexual intercourse? Under any circumstances, we appeal to the Select Committee not to lose this opportunity of extending the age to 14 years in the case of unmarried and widowed girls. There can be no opposition to such extension. Even Bengalis would not mind it. They only want the child-wives to be left unprotected, that is, a portion of them. They do not object to the protection of unmarried and widowed girls.

Various suggestions made in connection with the age of consent and the probable result if all of them were acted upon.

11. The same newspaper writes:—To please the Bengali Hindu, who calls himself orthodox and considers that his religion is in danger, the Legislature is asked to rule that intercourse with a girl on the performance of the Garbhádhána ceremony is not punishable. Now, we know it as a fact that this socalled ceremony is not performed by numerous Hindus. What is to be the test in their case? Others say that the word 'puberty' should be used, and it should be defined as the period when a well-known physical condition occurs. But doctors say that this physical condition may not occur at all, and yet a girl may become a mother. What is to be the test in these cases? The amendments, apparently, which would satisfy all the various races in India would be (1) to allow Hindus who are for the Garbhádhána ceremony, to perform it at any time, and under cover of it to inflict the very atrocities which the Legislature wishes to prevent; (2) to allow those Hindus who do not perform the said ceremony, to inflict such atrocities when "the well-known physical condition" appears, even if it is nominally or artificially produced; (3) to prohibit those Hindus, in whose wives this physical condition is altogether absent even at the ripe age of sixteen or twenty and cannot be anyhow produced, from having intercourse with them, or, as an alternative, fix a particular age for this class; (4) to fix "puberty and discretion" for the Mahomedans; (5) to fix the age of sixteen for European British subjects, that being the age in England and her colonies; (6) and to fix some other limits for the more manly Hindu races like the Sikhs. A hotch-potch like this is apparently what the agitators want. The authors of the Penal Code had similar proposals made to them about various other provisions. Had they listened to those proposals, we would have had "admirable confusion" in the Penal Code.

The Age of Consent Bill does not interfere with Hindu religion.

12. In expressing approval of the views of the Honourable Mr. Justice K. T. Telang, Dr. R. G. Bhándárkar, Mr. V. A. Modak and other supporters of the Age of Consent Bill, the Hitechchhu (84) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 19th February, observes:—In Gujarát, custom is more respected than the dictates of religion itself. Even among the Brahmans, several religious ceremonies are not performed at the time fixed by the Shástras. The Garbhádhána ceremony is quite unknown in Gujarát, where in some cases girls are married after they are 13 years old, while in other cases marriages are consummated while the girls are about 10 years old, and that they become mothers at 13. The Bill cannot therefore be said to interfere with the religious rites of the Gujaráti Hindus.

Misrepresentation alleged to be resorted to by the opponents of the Age of Consent Bill.

13. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 16th February, writes:—Mr. C. C. Mitra of Calcutta complains in the columns of a contemporary that "men supplied with khatas protesting against the Bill are sent about the streets to request all Hindu passers-by whom they come in contact with, not caring a bit whether they are acquainted with the petition or not, to have their name signed in the khata. All manner of inducements are offered, and no doubt much misrepresentation too is resorted to to obtain signatures, and those people who cannot write have their names written for them, whether they be men, women or children." We thought such misrepresentation was confined to Bombay, but it seems misrepresentation is everywhere the favourite weapon of the opponents of the Bill. The process of securing signatures, complained of by Mr. Mitra, is to be seen in our Bombay streets also. Credulous illiterate people are roundly told that the proposed measure would debar them from marrying their daughters before sixteen. Poor innocent men, they shudder at the information, or are indignant over it; and, if they cannot write, authorise their informant to add their name to the list of petitioners. This is no exaggeration, but a true statement of facts. We do not, indeed, mean that the leaders of the opposition are a conscious party to this fraud, but we do think their agents are not particularly scrupulous about their ways and methods. It may be that the agents are so ignorant as to have misconceived the Bill themselves. All the same, the heaps of signatures which are obtained to the opposition memorial are vitiated by this fault, and Government, when weighing their effect, will have to bear in mind the circumstances under which they were obtained.

Disapproval of the Age of Consent Bill, and its withdrawal or amendment in the directions pointed out, recommended.

14. In an article, headed, "Age of Consent Bill—an appeal to the Legislature," the Native Opinion (16), in its issue of the 15th February, writes:—Last Sunday's gigantic meeting at Mádhav Bág, resembling one of those popular demonstrations in Hyde Park in England, and the numerous meetings that have been and are being daily held all over the country, must have by this time convinced the Government of India of the great blunder they have committed in setting the legislative machinery in motion for raising the age of consent in the chapter on "Rape" in the Penal Code from 10 to 12. We have been all along unable to understand why the Government should have gone the length of venturing upon a policy of interference in this manner in matters religious and social in the teeth of its repeated declarations to the contrary. But they have allowed themselves to be misled, and there is no help. It is now of no use crying over the spilt milk. Here we have a Bill, and here a furious storm of opposition to it. At this juncture—critical, we may say,—it is the duty of every journalist to advise Government as to the best course for them to follow under the circumstances. We yet venture to implore the Government to retreat from the position which they have unwarily taken. There is yet scope for graceful retreat, and it will certainly be a very graceful act on their part if they do so in deference to popular opinion. If, however, they are still determined to be guided by persons whose leadership the country disowns in such an unequivocal manner, and to pass some measure of the kind, we beg of them, as a matter of grace, to so amend the Bill that the people may come to look upon it in an unopposing mood. If the Government are influenced by a reasonable and conciliatory spirit, they will, at all events, have the shrewdness to take note of the current of popular opinion and remove all the objectionable features from the Bill. In order that we may not be charged with having offered destructive criticism alone, we take liberty to suggest some amendments for the consideration of the Law Member and his colleagues, with the hope that they will meet with their approbation as also of our countrymen. (1) In the first place, we desire to point out to Sir A. Scoble the advisability of doing away with the arbitrary limit of years, and of substituting in its stead the one indicated by nature. It will be conceded without hesitation that the proposed limit has raised a tremendous opposition without holding out any tangible gain in view. If, therefore, puberty be fixed upon as the limit, no scope will be left for opposition on account of interference with religion—thereby removing the one great factor of complaint—and Government will also get the credit of enforcing the old Shastric rule which points out to the first manifestation of a certain physical condition as the proper period for the consummation of marriage—a much more desirable end than the present fruitless endeavour. (2) Having thus disposed of the point of opposition on the score of interference with religion which principally comes from the Hindus, we proceed to lay before the Government our suggestions as regards what we may call the procedure-side of the Bill. In this connection, the first point that strikes us is as regards the institution of complaints. We think it will be a very grave mistake to leave it within the power of anybody to institute criminal proceedings against the offending husband. The Bill as framed certainly does not provide any safeguard against this contingency, the result of which will undoubtedly be the facility with which one's enemies may wreak their vengeance upon him by simply setting the machinery of the criminal courts in motion against him and then washing their hands of the whole concern, the law being obliged to take its course without their further continuance in the course according to the ruling in re Ganesh Nárayan Sáthe (I. L. R. 13 Bom., page 600). In order, therefore, to avoid this undesireble result it is highly necessary to restrict in the clearest possible terms the right to commence proceedings to select and interested persons, i. e., either to the girl-wife or to her nearest maternal relative, thereby furnishing a guarantee that no vexatious and inimical prosecution may be forthcoming. (3) There must be clear provisions against the interference of the police in any manner in the investigation, nor must the inferior Magistrates have anything to do in the matter. The best course, we think, will be to provide that the prosecution be commenced only in the Court of Sessions, and that from these courts the public and the reporters should be rigidly excluded during the continuance of the proceedings, which must from their very nature be kept as secret as possible. (4) If any medical examination be found necessary to ascertain whether puberty had been reached when the offence was alleged to be perpetrated, it must be conducted not by a male doctor but by a lady doctor, and her certificate, which must be required to be written, should be treated as conclusive evidence on the point; otherwise the honour of the family will be in the greatest possible danger. Unless, therefore, this is provided for, serious result will be inevitable and the administration of this law will come to be abhorred in the most unequivocal manner. (5) There remains, lastly, the question of amount of punishment. We are of opinion that in the case of the offending husband it should not be the same with strangers accused of rape. Simple imprisonment for a short period and fine, which though unlimited should not be excessive, will be quite adequate to meet the demands of justice. We have thus purposely suggested both kinds of punishments, for, while to a rich man fine will be no punishment, imprisonment even for a day will be a serious matter, while to a poor man fine may be a great deterrent. If the Bill is amended in this manner, our countrymen should accept it without demur.

15. In a contributed article, the Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 15th February, writes:—Will the reformers pause for a moment to reflect that the Hindu law and usage are not inhuman, at least in the present instance? What they enjoin, or recommend (if the reformers like the word better), is the meeting between husband and wife after puberty (pubescence as the reformers term it), and not before that event. It is the contemplated amendment, in whose name heaven and earth are being moved, that is the sinner, and not the Hindu religion. We along with a few others have pointed out, and the authorities themselves have admitted by implication, that in 95 cases out of 100 the Age of Consent Bill will sanction a degrading practice by implication, for which neither acknowledged religious precept nor acknowledged usage among the Hindus has any sanction whatever. Which is more inhuman, the Hindu religion and usage or the Britain-made law as it is to be? If the supporters of the Bill have one grain of sincerity about them they ought honestly to acknowledge and to bravely point out to Government that their common stand is untenable, both from the point of humanity and of respect for religious sentiment. We do not think that for honest well-wishers of their country there is any humiliation in admitting their mistake and mending it like men, even if pointed out by those whom they have daubbed as reactionists. It is not the party-triumph, one would think, that they, as true sons of their country, ought to risk their everything upon, but the triumph of truth and of humanity with which religious sentiment is here at least in perfect accord. The single argument advanced by the supporters of the Bill in its present form against the proposal of making puberty the limit of age of consent instead of 12, is that it is too indefinite and that in some cases puberty is hastened by artificial means. We do not know how far the second charge will bear strict examination and inquiry; but whatever the truth at its bottom, it is one which no legislative enactment can possibly remove. For the removal of such injurious practices arising out of total ignorance, even the go-ahead reformers will, we imagine, admit that knowledge of the true state of things is the only remedy. Looking to the charge of indefiniteness, we fail to see how this limit is more indefinite than the age of 12. With the admittedly imperfect system or rather no system of registration, is it more easy to prove that a girl is under 12 than that she has begun to menstruate? Medical examination there will be in either case. If the human Government of India and its humane supporters are honestly of opinion that the running of such a risk, coupled with that of the trial of the ladies of the house as abettors, or at least of their presence and detention in the court as witnesses, is a smaller evil than allowing the influences of time, education, science, persuasion, &c., to work their effect in time, and if, in addition, the Government of India professes to respect Hindu religious sentiment which its supporters now advise it to repudiate, then, surely, let them amend their Bill on the lines we along with a few others have humbly suggested. In spite of Herbert Spencer as interpreted by the Maráthi editor of the Sudhárak (19), we would leave these things to all other means except that of vis major. But if Government in its wisdom is going to have it exercised, then we beseech it to be at least consistent with its professions, if not with its actual practice in the past, as Mr. Chandávarkar persuades himself he has proved it to have been. Those who will read without bias one way or the other the speeches of Messrs. Nána Moroji and Mahádev Chimnáji A'pte at the Mádhav Bág meeting of Sunday last, along with the masterly letter which Dr. Kirtikar has addressed to the Times of India of Monday last, cannot fail to be convinced that the evil sure to be imposed by the present Bill will be greater than the infinitesimal good it may do. Its preventive influence to a certain extent we fully admit. But the malicious prosecution and persecution it will give rise to in certain cases in the mofussil and also in towns, coupled with the disgrace it will entail upon respectable families both in case of acquittal and of conviction, as vividly depicted by Mr. A'pte, will be more aggravating and injurious in their effects than the little good it may possibly work. Even blind reformers will allow that the unscrupulous can safely defy the law where the act constituting the offence is of an exceptionally private character, as it is in the present case, while the ignorant, the credulous and the simple will be harassed in all possible ways by scoundrels and busybodies, and may secure ultimate conviction where no offence may have been really committed. The trial is not divested of all its worst horrors by the offence being made non-cognizable. Do our reformers, who profess to be humane as well as manly, look upon these contingencies, which in our opinion amount almost to certainties, without any twing to their hearts and consciences? If they do, we feel grateful to the Great Unknown for having made us of softer clay. The more we think upon the fatuous fondness with which reformers cling to the magical number 12, the greater our wonder grows. Some of them say even an orthodox husband can wait for a few days or months if his wife unfortunately reaches pubescence before 12 years. Now, let us clear the ground by admitting in the first place that, highly respecting as we do the teachings of physiology, we would individually desire that the meeting between husband and wife should not take place at least for two years after the first appearance of "certain well-known signs." But even in that case we fail to see why a particular age should be fixed down as a hard and fast limit for all women, no matter what their temperaments may be. Even physiology and medical science recognise, our rash reformers will pause to admit, individual differences of growth, maturity and decay. Have they never heard of precocity, both physical and intellectual? What does it mean if not variability of periods of growth of maturity and of decay? In the absence of artificial stimulants, if girl A reaches pubescence at 12 or below 12, while girl B does the same at 13 or even 14, is not the former girl, physiologically considered, at precisely the same stage of life at which the latter is, though not of the same age? How unscientific is it, then, not to talk of its impolicy, to offend religious susceptibilities in 5 cases out of 100, through sheer disregard or blind ignorance of the laws of nature? We trust those who have not taken final leave of their senses in the height of their maudlin philanthropy, humanity and manliness will reconsider their position in the light we have attempted to throw on the subject, before being irretrievably wedded to the bewitching number 12.

Disapproval of the Age of Consent Bill.

16. The Kdthidwdr Times (8), in its issue of the 19th February, writes:—

It is understood that the members of the India Council are not unanimous about the Age of Consent Bill and that the majority are opposed to the idea of forcing a reform against the wishes of the people. The opposition to the Bill is, as we have said, widespread, and it would be most hazardous to pass a law in the teeth of such opposition. The British Indian Association of Lucknow, representing the aristocracy of Lucknow, has also declared against the Bill. The opposition is not in Bengal alone, but in every principal centre throughout the Empire. Although Mr. Manmohan Ghose's idea of reforms are extreme, although he has long given up Hindu customs and manners, yet, as very few understand criminal legislation better than he, he is entitled to our careful consideration. He is strongly opposed to the Bill and has expressed his opposition with the boldness of conviction. The Bill has its ugly features and if passed into law it would prove an engine of torture in the hands of the wicked. Mr. Ghose's statement that Government should prohibit the marriage of girls before 12 cannot be regarded as sound, for, in that case, the Indian women will have to be on the look-out for husbands, as is the case in Europe. Even the graduates of Calcutta, numbering about a thousand, have condemned the Bill. The Anglo-Indian journals might well point to this sorry result of English education. The principal defect of the Bill obviously is that the material difference between rape and premature cohabitation is disregarded.

17. The Gujaráti (82), in its issue of the 15th February, observes:—In their desire to support Government in passing the Age of Consent Bill, the Anglo-Indian newspapers of Bombay publish the views of the reform side alone. Several local Vakils have signed a memorial in support of the Bill only to please the Honourable Mr. K. T. Telang, whilst some have signed both the memorials for and against the Bill. The opinions of well-known Englishmen and leading papers of England on the subject of the Bill are of no value, as they do not know our manners and customs. We recommend the British public to remember the lessons of history related by Gibbon about the downfall of the Roman supremacy, on account of its utter disregard of the views of the conquered races. The Mahomedan community has joined the orthodox Hindus in protesting against the Bill, and His Excellency the Viceroy will do well to withdraw the measure.

18. The Káside Mumbai (110), in its issue of the 16th February, observes:—The editor of one of our local Urdu contemporaries, who is a native of Bareilly and seems ignorant of the religious rites of the Mahomedans, suggested in the issue of his paper of 6th instant that the limit of the age of consent may be raised to 13 or 14 years. It is surprising that this individual should protest against Sir Andrew Scoble's Bill at a meeting held under the auspices of the Anjumán-i-Ishátul Islám. We recommend our co-religionists to refrain from joining meetings that are organised by persons not residents of Bombay. Mr. Badrudin Abdulla Kur's letter to the Times of India raising no objection to fixing the age of consent at 12, provided consummation of marriage is allowed at attainment of puberty at any time earlier, is somewhat reasonable; but prevention being better than cure, the Mahomedan community should protest against the Bill.

19. The Subodh Patrika (18), in its issue of the 15th February, writes:—

The Mádhav Bág meeting run down.

The much talked of Mádhav Bág meeting has come and gone, and we have had the humiliation of entering one more transaction in our book of shame. For an unreasonable and ill-regulated proceeding, it beats its predecessor quite hollow. A large crowd gathered, it is true, but they hardly formed a meeting. The noise and confusion which prevailed scarcely admitted of the performance of any regular business in the ordinary way. Few could hear what was being said or see what passed, and no intelligent vote on the resolutions could under such circumstances be given or taken. Indeed, scarcely anybody present seemed to feel the necessity of observing any method or giving a general coherence to the proceeding. But everybody acted pretty much on his own hook. Thus it came to pass that a meeting, which was professedly convened to adopt a memorial against the Age of Consent Bill, transacted quite as much business which was quite foreign to the professed object of the gathering. Was that a meeting that assembled or only a motley crowd of all sorts and conditions of people? Indeed, if our information be correct, by far the greater majority of the assemblage consisted of people who turned out of a Sunday for a little sight-seeing which they expected to enjoy at the Bág. It is no wonder, then, that among the audience were obtained a good many signatures to a bogus petition against the salt-tax and some in favour of the Bill itself. It goes without saying that such a gathering ought to carry little weight with the Legislature. Government must be reduced to the last straits of weakness and imbecility, if it can afford to heed a dissent born amidst such tumult and confusion. The opponents of the Bill are pleased to call it a most successful meeting; and if they intended to gather together a large mole around them, they have every reason to congratulate themselves on this achievement of a veritable bear garden. For our own part, we confess to a feeling of shame at this huge parody of a great constitutional privilege, and our only regret is that some honoured names among us should be found to have assisted at the unpardonable mockery.

The Mádhav Bág meeting considered a success and the objections embodied in the memorial adopted there considered reasonable.

20. The Gujarátí (82), in its issue of the 15th February, writes:—The last Sunday's Mádhav Bág meeting was really the largest assemblage ever witnessed in Bombay, and was attended by the leading men of all Hindu castes and creeds. Even the first historical Mádhav Bág meeting, presided over by the late Ráo Sáheb Vishvanáth Náráyan Mandlik, was not so numerously attended. But we wish the arrangements had been this time more satisfactory than they seemed to be. It is very unreasonable to expect 10,000 people, crammed into a limited place, to be perfectly quiet and orderly; but to represent the meeting as very disorderly is a deliberate perversion of truth. An assemblage which could be managed with the assistance of only two police peons deserves to be characterised by a more complimentary term than some of the epithets bestowed upon it by the supporters of the Bill. After a careful examination of last Sunday's proceedings it is pretty clear from the speeches of Ráo Bahádur Nána Moroji and Mr. A'pte, and from the memorial adopted at the meeting, that the objections urged against the Bill are three. The president as well as the latter gentleman were of opinion that the measure would prove an engine of oppression in the hands of busybodies and scandal-mongers. It must be admitted that apprehension on this score is very widely entertained, and we have no doubt that the views of such an experienced and cool-headed ex-Magistrate as Ráo Bahádur Nána Moroji and of one of the ablest High Court Pleaders like Mr. A'pte will have due weight with Government. It must also be borne in mind that the experience of many of the influential supporters of the measure is confined to presidency cities only, and as the Bill will mostly affect ignorant people, it is desirable that they should be protected from every kind of unnecessary vexation and harassment. The other objection is on the ground of religious interference. It is difficult to assess precisely its value in presence of the fact that among certain sections of the Hindu community the conceptual ceremony is altogether unknown, and even those amongst whom it prevails it is sometimes postponed on some ground or other. The third objection is in our judgment a very sound one. Since Lord Dufferin's Government distinctly declared that it was undesirable to undertake legislation for didactic purposes, Sir Andrew Scoble's contention that the amended section, though it is likely to prove a dead letter is to be welcomed for its educative operation, is in direct contradiction to the views previously enunciated by Government. Nor is it easy to determine if the amendment was demanded by any influential section of the community, because the question would then arise as to which is the more influential party of the two, the supporters or the opponents of the Bill.

Approval of the proceedings at the Mádhav Bág meeting.

21. The Native Opinion (16), in its issue of the 15th February, writes:—Last Sunday's meeting at the Mádhav Bág to protest against the Age of Consent Bill was a success. The proceedings were commenced by voting Ráo Bahádur Nána Moroji to the chair. Short and closely argumentative speeches made at the meeting placed before the assembled audience in one connected link facts showing how the proposed law interfered with the customs of the people. One peculiar feature of the meeting was a letter to the president from a few villages in the Poona District, intimating that they fully sympathised with that day's protest. Two other points of importance were the vote of censure on Mr. L. Ashburner, late member of our Executive Council, for his most slanderous attack on the chastity of Indian widows, and the other, the expression of deep sorrow at the untimely death of Mr. Bradlaugh, the great Indian champion. We believe few of those who oppose the present Bill oppose social reform as such. The opposition is against the manner in which the reform is proposed to be worked out, and the amount of literature published on the points will show that the generality of people in their view of the Act have reason on their side. The question of age or puberty apart, will not the penal sections of the proposed law, though the offence is rendered non-cognizable, serve as an instrument of tyranny in the hands of the police? This is one point on which a large number of the orthodox and the reformers will, we believe, agree. People may be induced to put off the Garbhádhána ceremony, but nothing will induce them to fear the less the powers which neither the magistracy nor the police will very discreetly exercise.

The Mádhav Bág meeting and its detractors.

22. The Vártáhar (20), in its issue of the 15th February, writes:—It is always the case that when men have no proper arguments to advance they throw dirt on their adversaries. Last Sunday's Mádhav Bág meeting, which passed off so successfully, was not, it seems, liked by the supporters of Sir A. Scoble's Bill, which has created so much sensation in the minds of the Native community from one end to the other. The opposition, it must be remembered, is headed by so distinguished a Judge as Sir R. C. Mitter, a lawyer of extensive erudition, one who occupied at one time the enviable position of Chief Justice of Bengal, and acted for Sir Richard Garth. As a legislator, he has had his say in the Imperial Council. The apprehension with which he views the bantling of the Legal Member has been seen in vivid colours by his fellow-brethren in the north, south, east and west, and petitions from all sides of the empire have poured in. At the recent meeting held at Mádhav Bág to protest against the Age of Consent Bill there were the old and venerable Mr. Varjivandás representing the Bania community; Mr. Justice Janárdan Vásudevji (a former Judge of the Bombay High Court, a colleague of Sir M. Sausse, of Sir Joseph Arnould, of Justices Newton and Hebbert and of the famous Mr. Justice Anstey), who spent his forty years in the judicial service; Ráo Bahádur Nána Moroji, an ex-Presidency Magistrate of Bombay and the mofussil, whose magisterial, revenue and political experience is second to none on this side; Mr. Mahádev Chimnáji Á pte, a distinguished graduate of the University, practising as a pleader for the last twenty years in the High Court; Professors Tilak and Jinsiwále; Dr. A. M. Kunte, M.D.; and other men of light and leading, numbering over thousands. The gist of their opinions was that the matter which the Legislature intends to pose on the people is unjustifiable. After quoting Mr. Mahádev Chimnáji A'pte's speech at the meeting, the paper observes:—Here are plain facts which our legislators would do well to study, ere they rushed into the arena of legislation and struck on its anvil doing more harm than good. It must not be supposed that the city of Bombay can count only Messrs. K. T. Telang, Chandávarkar, Bhándárkar, and a few others, as its savants. But who are they? They are not representative men. They may shine in their own sphere, but they cannot command respect in the Hindu community, as a whole. They are but a speck on the area of one small caste, the Shenvis, whereas those who had assembled at Mádhav Bág represented every conceivable section, race, and caste, and we hope the men who simply parade themselves as supporters of the measure will not allow themselves to think that they alone constitute the elite of Bombay, and that those who dissent from them are either merely the scum of the people or sweepings of the streets, to be despised, detested or cast away. This is certainly neither magnanimous nor generous on the part of those who call themselves educated men.

23. The Kesari (43), in its issue of the 17th February, states that a meeting of about seven thousand Hindus of all castes and creeds, comprising leading traders, doctors, pleaders, graduates, &c., was held at Poona on the 15th instant on the open ground in front of Shanvár Váda, under the presidency of Ráo Sáheb Tátya Sáheb Khájgiwále, for the purpose of adopting a memorial to His Excellency the Viceroy disapproving of the Age of Consent Bill, and that its proceedings were conducted without the least confusion or disorder.

24. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 15th February, writes:—We have the highest respect and reverence for Mr. Hume. We are willing to follow his advice when it is reasonable and in regard to matters of which he undoubtedly possesses more knowledge than we do. We are prepared to listen carefully to, and ponder thoughtfully upon, any advice coming from him, however unpalatable it may be. But we have every right to judge for ourselves in all matters. Now, in regard to this very burning topic of the day, the Age of Consent Bill, we think that Mr. Hume does not grasp the situation thoroughly. The advantages of the Bill are doubtful, while there are chances of serious mischief. If the Government be allowed to pass the Bill without a protest, it would be made a ground for interference in other religious practices, just as we find now that the action of Government in regard to Sati is brought forward as an argument in favour of the present Bill. It is the duty of every honest well-wisher of the country and the Government to bring these considerations to the notice of the latter; and we have discharged this duty conscientiously. Let our opponents attribute dishonesty to us. Reasonable people will judge whether we are dishonest or those who, knowing that there will be religious interference, are prepared to shut their eyes to it, nay, to make an attempt to prove the contrary. We have often pointed out that we are not against the particular reform advocated. Individually, we would be prepared to go even further than what the Government proposes to do, but we are certainly not prepared to force our views upon the large mass of orthodox people, to compel them by law to accept our opinions. We have every confidence that in time most of the reforms now preached would be gradually accepted by our countrymen. Already considerable progress has been made, and there is no reason to despair yet. We must thank our contemporary of the Hindu for understanding our position correctly and doing justice to us in its remarks made in a recent issue in an article under the heading "English Education on Trial." We assure our contemporary that it has been ever our policy to insist upon reform. We have not spared to criticise the orthodox community whenever some of their practices demanded such treatment.

Reasons why the Mahrátta is opposed to the Age of Consent Bill.

25. The same newspaper publishes a letter from Mr. B. G. Tilak, in which he quotes, in reply to Dr. Bhándárkar, seven texts and statements enjoining in express terms the performance of what is called the Garbhádhána or consummation ceremony on the first course, and remarks:—I might go on quoting more authors, if I like. But these are enough to show that Dr. Bhándárkar's interpretation of the Parishista is a modern invention, and that all our Smriti and Prayoga writers clearly and expressly enjoin Garbhádhána to be performed on the occasion of the first course. Of course, there are exceptions, as when the husband is ill, or the first course takes place on a highly inauspicious day. But like all exceptions they prove the rule. Without fear of any contradiction I may therefore state that from the earliest times of the Sutras down to the present day, a period extending over not less than 2,500 years, this has been our Shástra and practice. If you want to rely on it, take it as it has been and as it is. If not, that is a different matter altogether. I hope this will put a stop to all the ludicrous perversions and misinterpretations of Hindu Shástras that find insertion in the papers now-a-days. It is an unfortunate event that scholars like Mr. Justice Telang and Dr. Bhándárkar should, in the heat of a reform controversy, forget their proper function. They are not called upon to invent, but to find out what the Shástra is, and I am sorry that they should approach the subject in such a spirit. There are hundreds of other subjects where our ingenuity may be better spent.

Mr. B. G. Tilak's reply to Dr. Bhándárkar in connection with the Shastric aspect of the Age of Consent Bill.

PART III.—Education.

26. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 16th February, writes:—A correspondent makes some complaints on behalf of the students of the Technical Institute, which appear to be well-founded. The engineering curriculum of the Institute, we are told, "includes the lines prescribed by the Bombay Boiler Inspection Act," and yet it is a pity the holders of the Technical diplomas are compelled to submit themselves to a fresh examination to hold appointments under the Bombay Boiler Inspection Act. We hope this anomaly in the Government ruling will be removed, as it places the students of the Technical Institute at a clear disadvantage and is "far from giving them a status." Another complaint is that the new Examination Rules framed by the Board of the Institute give the diploma of the Licentiate of Mechanical Engineering only to those who pass in the first class in three or four subjects, at each of the yearly examinations during the course, while the rest who pass in the second or pass class are made ineligible for the diploma. If the Board wish to raise the standard of the Technical examination very high, let them by all means do it, and give the diploma only to those who pass in the first class, as they have ruled; but let them not at the same time consider the rest to have passed at all, when their passing is to be of no use to them. Let them rule that the rest will be considered as plucked, or if they are not willing to do that, let them give the second class and the pass candidates the option of trying for the diploma till they succeed, and in no case let them give a retrospective effect to this distinction they have newly made. The whole ruling, as at present made, appears clearly unfair, and we hope the Board will see their way to mend it.

Government and the Poona Municipality.

27. The Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 19th February, writes:—We are inclined to think that if the Bombay Government is really bent upon introducing radical and extensive changes into the administration of the mofussil municipalities, at least in the case of the more important of them, and further, if it is bent upon assimilating the municipal administration of the leading municipalities in the mofussil with the administration in the presidency town of Bombay, it is hardly fair on the part of the Bombay Government to expect the Poona City Municipality to frame a Bill so different in principle to all its traditions. The Bombay Government ought in all fairness to undertake that responsibility on its own shoulders, and ought not to abdicate it in favour of even the most favoured among the mofussil municipalities. That the Poona City Municipality is not one of the most favoured among mofussil municipalities is evident from the tone of the recent Government resolution; but even if it were, it would be hardly fair, we repeat, to call upon that municipality to frame a Bill to give effect to the new policy, and that too at a month's notice. It should be remembered that the Act which governs and regulates the administration of such leading municipalities in the mofussil as Poona, Karáchi, Ahmedabad, Surat, &c., also governs and regulates the administration of such petty municipalities as Alandi and Jejuri in the Poona District and similar other towns in other districts. It is no wonder, therefore, that the legislation which can be equally applicable to both the classes of municipalities named above must in the very nature of things be a very defective piece of legislation; and for such an unsatisfactory state of things the Government and the Legislature must alone be held responsible. Let the reader suppose for one moment that the same piece of legislation had governed and regulated the administration in the presidency town of Bombay and let him answer the question if it would have fulfilled the object sought to be attained. It must not be supposed that we are advocating new legislation on the lines of the Bombay City Municipal Act, 1888. Far from it. What we wish to emphasize is that one and the same piece of legislation will not answer in the case of all municipalities, and that if Government should be of the same view, it is they who should frame the measure to give effect to the new policy.

Ráo Sáheb Námjoshi on the Government resolution on the Poona Municipality.

28. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 15th February, publishes a letter from Mr. M. B. Námjoshi, which is concluded as follows:—In conclusion, I may say that the system of making lump grants in the budget and allowing the managing committee to look to the details has obtained since 1874; that distinguished members of the Civil Service, such as Mr. Richey, Mr. Moore, Mr. Campbell, and Mr. East himself, have given that system the authority of their approval; that the general body have been exercising an effective control over expenditure by making full use of the powers vested in them, and that the committee of management has been taking precautions to prevent waste of the ratepayers' money. The facts I have placed before the public will place them in a fix, because, under the circumstances I have related, they will not be able to understand how such a complete misunderstanding about the work of the Poona Municipality could have arisen so as to induce Government and its officers to take an entirely mistaken view of the whole situation. You will not, I fear, permit me to further lengthen this letter because it has already become lengthy, and I shall therefore only suggest the origin of this misunderstanding, leaving it to another member to dilate upon it. The whole is the result of the system of "government by chief clerks." On this letter the paper remarks:—This is Ráo Sáheb Námjoshi's third letter on the subject of the Government resolution censuring the Poona Municipality. This treats of the subject of the transgression of rules. This charge is looked upon by Government as unpardonable, and we are glad to find that the evidence produced by the Ráo Sáheb is crushing. What is most strange is that Mr. East so far forgot himself that he could not recollect what he himself wrote in 1885. By his special pleading he has only stultified himself. None, they say, is so blind as he who does not see, and Government, we are sure, would not shut their eyes to such glaring abuse of power. The Honourable Mr. West is, we understand, in charge of the Department, and if West and East only keep their natural positions the decision of Government cannot but be favourable to the municipality.

His Excellency the Governor's visit to Dhulia and the local municipality.

29. The Khándesh Chitragupta (44), in its issue of the 15th February, praises Mr. Loch, Collector of Khándesh, for having communicated to the Dhulia Municipality his disapproval of their intention to spend Rs. 500 from municipal funds on the reception of His Excellency the Governor at his next visit to that town, and observes that the ratepayers are highly obliged to the Collector for his action in the matter. The members of the Dhulia Municipality, adds the paper, have since raised private subscriptions for the purpose.

His Excellency the Governor's visit to Násik and the local municipality.

30. The Násik Vritt (50), in its issue of the 14th February, considers the sum of Rs. 350 sanctioned by the Násik Municipality for the reception of His Excellency the Governor at his approaching visit to be very large, says that it does not understand under what section of the Municipal Act the municipality could spend money on such an object, and asks whether there is no one to question the legality of such proceedings.

A suggestion to the municipal authorities, Surat, to prevent storing of combustibles in the city.

31. The Surya Prakásh (88), in its issue of the 14th February, regrets that the municipal authorities at Surat should not have, after the lesson of the great conflagration of 1889, ascertained the real cause of the frequent fires in the city, and says that last week a stable situated behind the municipal office was on fire, and would have caused serious damage to the neighbouring buildings if expeditious measures had not been adopted to extinguish it. The paper requests the municipality to keep strict watch on the stables and see that more than the authorized quantity of grass is not stored in them, and to prohibit storing large quantities of cotton within the city limits.

Part V.—Native States.

Exaction of forced labour in the Baroda State.

32. In alluding to the visit of His Highness the Gáikwár of Baroda last year to Ubhrat, a village near Navsari, and that of Mahárání Jamnábái to the latter place, the Gujardt Mitra (83), in its issue of the 16th February, complains that several men and women, among whom there were some British subjects, were on these occasions put to forced labour and had to suffer great inconvenience to obtain payment of their wages of two annas per head. The Mitrá observes that several Bráhmans and other high-caste Hindus were also employed on one occasion, against their will, to remove the carcass of an elephant belonging to His Highness at Navsari, and that that incident created great commotion at that place and in the surrounding villages. The paper recommends the Indian National Congress to take due notice of the grievances of the subjects of Native States against their respective rulers.

Treatment of the British Government as foreign Government by the opponents of the Age of Consent Bill disapproved.

The Vaidarbh (2), in its issue of the 14th February, writes :—In matters of temperance orthodox Hindus have been in the habit of accusing the Government of not coming to their assistance by not placing sufficient restrictions on the manufacture and sale of liquor. Now, why should this assistance be asked ? Why should not everything be left to the spread of education or to the influence of Hindu religion ? Those who say that Government should have nothing to do with raising the age of consent in the case of marriage should remember that thereby they incapacitate themselves from asking the aid of Government on the subject of temperance. The thing is, people forget that it is unreasonable to treat the British Government as foreign. It is their own Government and it is their right to ask, as it is the duty of the Government to give, assistance to them in all matters, including religion, which affect their well-being. We cannot regard as reasonable the attitude of those who oppose the Bill on the undisclosed ground that it is the act of a foreign Government. These people are guided more by their feelings than by their reason. If the Hindus have any sense of gratitude (and we have no doubt they have plenty of it), they should feel utmost gratitude for the Age of Consent Bill, which is the result of the most benevolent and prudent motives—a measure which apparently confers no benefit whatever upon the Europeans, but is calculated to do immense good to the Hindus.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ā) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Lord Cross's Indian Councils' Bill in the House of Commons.

1. In alluding to the re-introduction into the House of Commons of Lord Cross's Indian Councils' Bill in the form in which it passed the House of Lords last year, the Jâme Jamshed (109), in its issue of the 25th February, says:—With Messrs. Maclean and Lethbridge's advocacy of the Bill there are strong fears of the measure being passed in its present form and India being excluded from obtaining the right of popular representation for the next ten years. By her great misfortune Mr. Bradlaugh is not living to bring forward and advocate his Bill with all chances of its being approved by the lower House. It is true that Mr. Maclaren has given notice of opposing the Government Bill for the absence of elective principle from it; but he stands little chance of securing success to his side unless the Liberal party musters in strong numbers to support the motion. If the Liberals show sympathy with India in Parliament to the degree and extent they profess outside the Houses, then alone can we have some hope of securing to a limited extent at least the right of popular representation which the country stands in so much need of.

The Indian textile manufactories and the Manchester cotton manufacturers.

2. In alluding to a statement in a recent issue of the Pioneer, about pressure being put on the Government of India by the Secretary of State for India for passing an amended Indian Factory Act in the face of the report of the Indian Factory Commission, the Bombay Samachár (95), in its issue of the 25th February, says:—Finding that the report of the Factory Commission has proved disappointing to the textile manufacturers of Manchester, Mr. Maclean has made extracts from the evidence recorded before the Commission that would favour his advocacy of a motion in the House of Commons recommending that a new Factory Act be passed for curtailing the working hours in the Indian cotton factories and assimilating the general condition of the mill hands in India to that of English workmen on the lines of the English Factory Act. It has ever been the desire of a small portion of the English people to act harshly and unjustly towards the countries in political dependence on England, and this selfishness is much developed in the character of the Manchester cotton manufacturers, who have in their exclusive interests got the Indian import duties on Europe cotton goods abolished, and brought to bear undue pressure on Indian cotton manufactories which have become their competitors in the world's market for textile goods. Unfortunately for India these selfish cotton manufacturers command such powerful influence that the English Ministry trembles before them, and this spectacle has created a very low opinion of the Ministry in the minds of the Indian people. [The Jâme Jamshed (109), in its issue of the 23rd February, expresses similar sentiments.]

The Pioneer on His Excellency Lord Harris's administration of the Bombay Presidency.

3. The Phœnix (5), in its issue of the 18th February, writes:—It is satisfactory to find that the Pioneer has set its seal of approbation upon the present Governor of Bombay. It is difficult to detest two successive Governors, and His Excellency Lord Harris owes his certificate of character as much to reaction as to his own merits. The Allahabad paper had not much love for Lord Reay; it was even unnecessarily demonstrative almost to frenzy. Lord Harris came in after the fit was over. He was a Conservative; that was a great consolation. He was a great cricketer, another successful requisite for a ruler of men, and, on the whole, he followed the policy of let-aloneism. All this has been in His Excellency's favour, and although the Bombay papers are still wisely reticent, the Allahabad paper has given him its valuable tribute of praise. So far the public has not had many opportunities of judging Lord Harris. That he is not Lord Reay is a fact which is of not much significance. No one expected that he would come up to Lord Reay's standard. But there is no reason why Lord Harris should not prove a successful Governor on the whole. He has excellent capacity for work and appears to be very cautious. It is noteworthy that if his administration has not yet been

Appointment of the Rája of Bhinga as a Native Member for the North-West Provinces in the Imperial Legislative Council disapproved.

4. The Rást Goftár (88), in its issue of the 22nd February, writes:—A telegram says that the Rája of Bhinga will succeed the Honourable Mahomed Ali Khán as Native Member for the North-West Provinces in the Imperial Legislative Council. Who is this Rája of Bhinga? Is he the same person whose name was freely mentioned at the time of the Allahabad Congress? If all that has been said of him be true, he will be little better than a dummy in the Viceroy's Council. The practice of selecting members for the Imperial Council from far and near is excellent; but unless we are sadly mistaken, the Rája of Bhinga's elevation to the Council is far-fetched and worth little. We said once that the days of dummies were over. We may, perhaps, now modify this assertion a little by saying that the days of dummies are almost over, but not altogether.

This year's list of Justices of the Peace in Bombay considered unsatisfactory.

5. The Native Opinion (16), in its issue of the 26th February, writes:—This year's list of Justices of the Peace is unsatisfactory and very carelessly drawn up. While several children of wealth, hardly out of their teens, have somehow or other managed to get in, the names of gentlemen who by their intellectual attainments have made a position for themselves in this city, are missing. We may mention only one name, and that is of Ráo Sáheb Vásudev Jagannáth Kirtikar, one of our veteran High Court Pleaders. Then, again, while the name of Mr. G. V. Karkare is struck off, presumably on account of his no longer being a resident of this city, we find those of Khán Bahádur Kazi Shábudin, Ráo Bahádurs Barve and Ráste retained. Strange to say, we come across Dr. Wordsworth also!

Government ought not to expect pecuniary help from the Municipal Corporation, Bombay, in aid of the proposed Trades Museum at the Presidency town.

6. In noticing the letter from the Government of Bombay to the Municipality of Bombay, asking what pecuniary aid the Corporation is prepared to give to the proposed Trades Museum at the Presidency town, the Bombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 23rd February, remarks that it is not right for Government to expect any pecuniary help from the Corporation, which is itself in lack of funds for furthering sanitary and other improvements of which the town is in sad need.

Remarks in connection with the assessment of the income-tax and hearing of appeals in the matter.

7. The Pratod (58), in its issue of the 23rd February, says:—If Government enquire of Assistant and Deputy Collectors, they will see how unwilling the Revenue officers are to do the work of hearing appeals against the income-tax assessment in addition to their other duties of a more important character. The average number of these appeals is about 200 for each táluka, which is disposed of in ten or at the most twelve hours. We have often seen that they do not take on an average more than two minutes for hearing and disposing of an appeal. The hearing of appeals is thus simply a farce and it is much to be regretted that it has been constantly enacted ever since the introduction of the tax in spite of loud complaints from the people. Another anomaly in this connection is that the Mámlatdárs, being overworked, entrust the work of assessment to Bhág Kárkuns, who in their turn get it done by village officers, and the Mámlatdárs have little time to see whether the schedules filled in by these Kárkuns are correct. Besides, both the officers who assess the tax and those who hear appeals belong to the Revenue Department, and the latter are naturally generally disposed to confirm what is done by other officers of the same Department. In order to remedy the oppressive incidence of the tax, Government should appoint for a few months of the year a special officer to hear appeals of two or three tálukas, as suggested by a Divisional Commissioner in his Administration Report for 1889-90, instead of saddling the already over-burdened Revenue officers with this work.

8. The Ratik Ranjani (140), in its issue of the 19th February, says that in most of the villages of the Navalgund Táluka and Nargund Petha in the Dhárwár District there has been an almost complete failure of crops for want of timely rainfall last year; that the rayats are too poor to provide for themselves and their cattle until the next harvest; and that the District Collector should under such circumstances grant remission of land assessment to them with the previous sanction of his superiors.

9. The Pratod (58), in its issue of the 23rd February, complains of frequent cases of incendiarism and theft and consequent insecurity of life and property in the Válva Tátuka of the Sátára District, and says that offenders seem to have been encouraged in their nefarious practices by the recent acquittal by the Sessions Court, for want of sufficient evidence, of the accused in one or two murder cases. To show how bold the robbers have lately become, the paper refers to a burglary committed by breaking open a shop situated very near the quarters occupied at A'shta by the Assistant Collector, the Mámlatdár, the Police Superintendent, the Police Inspector and some Police subordinate officers and constables; and considers it a fortunate circumstance that Ráo Sáheb Pendse, a First Class Magistrate, is at present the Mámlatdár of the Táluka, who, the paper feels sure, will not allow the feeling of insecurity to grow to that extent to which it rose this time last year.

10. The Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 23rd February, writes:—It is, we believe, now abundantly clear that the Age of Consent Bill cannot be passed as it stands, and that it will have to be materially modified. The sooner this fact is recognized the better will it be for all interested in the progressive development of the country. It is to be greatly deplored that the controversy on the subject was allowed to assume a religious aspect, and that gentlemen learned in the Shástras should have arrayed themselves on one side or other: one set maintaining that there are express texts in the Shástras ordaining the performance of the Garbhádhána ceremony immediately after the attainment of a certain well-known physical condition, and the other set maintaining the contrary with equal fervor and pertinacity. We are inclined to think that this controversy, as being more or less of an academic character, has no practical bearing on the question now raised, and that therefore the Legislature should not allow itself to be guided by it. The Legislature has no means at its disposal to test the soundness or otherwise of the two rival theories. Under these circumstances the Legislature can surely afford to ignore the controversy altogether and to proceed upon known facts. The intentions of the Government of India in framing the present measure cannot for a moment be questioned. The object sought to be attained is, no doubt, extremely laudable and ought to commend itself to all right-minded men. That object is to discourage the practice of premature sexual intercourse and premature consummation of marriage. As regards the practice of premature sexual intercourse, as exemplified in rearing up young girls for a life of prostitution, there is a general agreement that the Legislature may fix any natural or arbitrary age limit. As regards the other practice, namely, of premenstrual consummation of marriage, it is also agreed to by those who are opposing the present measure on the ground of religion, that the practice is sinful and is discouraged by the Shástras. They maintain, however, that soon after the attainment of a certain well-known physical condition by a girl-wife, it is obligatory on the husband to perform the Garbhádhána ceremony and to consummate the marriage. It is contended that five or six per cent. of the Indian girls, especially in Bengal, do attain puberty before they have completed their twelfth year, and that in their case it would be a serious hardship if the present measure were passed into law. It is also contended that the majority of the Indian girls attain puberty when they have completed their thirteenth or fourteenth year. It will be thus seen that, assuming for the sake of argument that the proposed law will prove oppressive marked by any measures of reform, it has neither been disfigured by any mischievous measure, and that in itself is a great thing. But as the present Governor himself is rather undemonstrative and inclined to be reticent, the wisest course is to suspend judgment until his administration draws to a close.

in practice at least in its educative influence, it will at the best protect five or six per cent. of the Indian girls, while as regards the large majority it will produce, or is at any rate calculated to produce, precisely the opposite result. It is eminently calculated by implication and inference to encourage Indian husbands to consummate the marriage soon after their girl-wives shall have completed their twelfth year even though they may not have attained puberty, under the belief that it would be safe and legal to do so. We are inclined to think that all right-minded men will deprecate such a result. If legislation is at all calculated to effect the desired end in such matters, either by its deterrent penalties or by its educative influence, but more especially by the latter, it would be better, we venture to think, to inculcate the doctrine that it is both unsafe and reprehensible to consummate marriage before the wife attains a certain well-known physical condition. Thus the largest good of the largest number will be secured. By making pre-menstrual consummation of marriage a penal offence, the Legislature will be able to afford legal protection to all immature girls against sexual violence, while by the proposed measure such legal protection will be afforded not to all immature girls, but only to those who may be under twelve. The amendment we therefore propose is that instead of amending Section 375 in the way proposed, it should be left as it stands now, and another section should be added to the Indian Penal Code, making it a penal offence for the husband to have sexual intercourse with his wife before she attains puberty. As in the case of the offences mentioned in Section 497 (adultery with a married woman) and Section 498 (enticing or taking away or detaining with a criminal intent a married woman), the Courts should be debarred from taking cognizance of the new offence, unless the prosecution is instituted by the girl herself or by her natural and legal guardians on the parents' side, or in the absence of the latter by the State in its capacity as the guardian of all orphans. The offences mentioned in Sections 497 and 498 are admittedly serious offences against public morality, perhaps more serious than the proposed offence, and yet the Legislature has not reserved to the State as the guardian of public morality the right of instituting a prosecution in respect of the said offences. Similarly we see no adequate reason for reserving to the State in respect of the new offence of pre-menstrual consummation of marriage any right to institute a prosecution against the offending husband except under the particular circumstances we have defined above; while as regards officious neighbours and others we see no reason whatever for giving them the right to institute such prosecutions. The only question that now remains to be dealt with is about the penalty that should be fixed for the offence. As regards this question there are several circumstances which, in our opinion, deserve to be taken into serious consideration. It should be remembered that it is impossible to imagine a case worse than that of the unfortunate girl-wife, Phulmani Dasi, who died on the 16th June 1890 from injuries received on the previous night as the result of sexual intercourse with her husband, Hari Mohan Maiti. If a learned Judge of the known ability of Mr. Justice Wilson considered the offence adequately punished with only one year's rigorous imprisonment, and if the State, which was prosecutor in the case, saw no reason to move the Appellate Court for enhancement of the sentence, which course we believe it was competent to it to follow if it had considered the penalty awarded very inadequate, we are inclined to think that the offence under the proposed section would be adequately punished if the accused on conviction were liable to only one year's imprisonment of either description or to fine or both.

Mr. M. M. Ghose of Calcutta on the Age of Consent Bill.

11. The Phœnix (5), in its issue of the 18th February, writes :—It requires some self-denial to avoid taking any notice of the controversy raging round this measure, nor would it be fair to take no note of the extraordinary display of feeling which it has called forth. It is no exaggeration to say that there is not a single Indian newspaper which does not devote a large portion of its space to this measure. Both sections of the press are almost wholly taken up by it. Letters of portentous length for and against the Bill continue to appear in almost all daily papers, and leading articles are devoted to the same subject. A most important lesson to be learnt from this agitation is the extraordinary and almost incredible growth of public opinion in this country. It has become a force to be reckoned with, a vitality to be recognised.

So well, indeed, has this agitation been organised, that it seems wonderful that such a result was overlooked when the measure was introduced. The Government have gone about very cautiously, and yet it seems that the depth of popular feeling was not properly sounded before the Bill was brought forward in Council. This is evident from the fact that even after its introduction Government have asked for the opinions of a large number of leading Indian gentlemen throughout the country. This is rather an unusual course to follow, and shows the praiseworthy anxiety of the Government to avoid giving a severe shock to popular feeling if possible. Extensive and, as it then appeared, exhaustive inquiries were made when it was under contemplation to raise the age of consent by legislation, and the great consensus of medical as well as official opinion was found to be in favour of such a measure. The one opinion that was not consulted is popular opinion and this is now making itself felt in a rather formidable manner. Even those who were disposed to differ from Sir Romesh Chunder Mitter, or even to sneer at his shallow gloss of civilization, will be bound to admit that he was the first to recognise and boldly to ask the Government to recognise the existence of an opposition which would have to be reckoned with. We are very far from saying that opposition of this kind is necessarily to be yielded to. It is the duty of the Legislature to face opposition as much as to court approval. Popular feeling is not always the right feeling. Custom sanctions evils which only the strong hand of the Legislature can remove. But it is one thing to be aware of opposition and to prepare to meet it; but to be surprised by fierce opposition where much opposition was not expected, is a different thing. It is no use concealing that this is what has happened. It may be that the demonstration is spurious, that the excitement is unreasonable, and the alarm unfounded. But it is always difficult to judge of the spontaneity of popular agitation. If you apply the est to one kind of agitation, you must also apply it to another. If, therefore, the opposition to the measure is set down as artificial, the difficulty remains as before, because a fact must be recognised, and the fact that the opposition appears to be far more formidable than was at first supposed cannot be denied. The only regret is that the Government are not given sufficient credit not only for good intentions, which would be doubtful praise, but for their earnest desire to respect religion and custom as far as consistent with the absolute need for dealing with an evil. It is not at the instance of a solitary social reformer, or the desire of an English Committee, that this measure has been brought forward. There is a large body of local Indian opinion entirely in favour of the measure. Those who hold this opinion may be in a minority, but a movement of reform is never set on foot except by a minority. But this minority includes several names respected throughout the country, men whose learning, respect for their own religion, and whose exemplary lives are beyond question. Men by no means of the ultra-Radical type, but sober, cautious men, thoroughly conservative in their ways of thinking, have cordially approved of the measure. Government had this important fact before them when they decided to amend their own law, and not the ancient law of the country. But they are prepared to meet their adversaries further, and with this object have called for additional independent opinion. One of these is that of Mr. Manmohan Ghose, whom even the Pioneer admits to be "certainly one of the ablest lawers of Calcutta," who has published a note in response to an invitation from the Government of Bengal and the request of several friends. Mr. Ghose's note is a very important contribution to the discussion. He is very far from an orthodox Hindu, and holds a very strong opinion against child-marriage. Mr. Ghose's note, as distinguished from the writings of Mr. Telang, Dr. Bhándárkar and others, is devoted mainly to the consideration of the legal aspects of the measure, and is, therefore, specially valuable. The measure is an amendment of the criminal law, and will have special reference to Bengal, as is now only too evident, and Mr. Ghose knows more about criminal trials in Bengal than perhaps any other lawyer. An important disclosure which Mr. Ghose makes relates to the difference which will be created between the English and the Indian law if the Bill is passed as it stands. We remember that in a leaflet which was the origin of this measure it was pointed out that the Indian law, as compared with the English, was quite inadequate for the protection of girls. Mr. Ghose points out that now the anomaly will be the other way, and a husband in India may be punished very much more severely than a stranger in England, and it is needless to say that protection from a stranger should be more effectual than from a husband. Mr. Ghose, who argues out his case with great ability, disapproves of the measure chiefly on the ground that it will not be an "effectual remedy for the evils which undoubtedly exist," and is not worth incurring so much opposition. He proposes that instead of making a futile penal law, the Government should strike at the root of the evil by making the marriageable age for girls twelve and imposing a civil disability. The opposition to such a measure, he says, will not be greater than what it is to the present measure, while the real benefit and reform that would attend the fixing of a minimum marriageable age would be certainly great. This declaration of opinion, we are informed, has met with very severe opposition, and perhaps a storm of indignation is brewing. There are many who think with Mr. Ghose, but we are afraid that his proposal is beyond the limits of practical consideration. The question is, how far Government can go without endangering their prestige and their declared policy of religious tolerance. Marriage is not a civil contract among Hindus and cannot be made such by the Legislature; and to impose a disability upon a sacramental rite would not be an indirect but a direct interference with religion. This is felt by those who would otherwise be glad to see the marriageable age raised, but they are convinced that it is beyond the province of the Legislature. The proposal of Mr. Ghose cannot be accepted by Government without the serious risk of losing the support of the influential minority which is now supporting it, and without causing widespread alarm and discontent. The caution with which Government are proceeding in this instance may be regarded as a guarantee that they will not undertake a measure, however desirable, which must assume a revolutionary character.

Postponement of the operation of the Age of Consent Act for six months recommended.

12. The Gujaráti (84), in its issue of the 22nd February, writes:—The present agitation on the Age of Consent Bill has done good so far as it has acquainted people with the object of the proposed amendment, but there is a very large portion of the Hindu community which is as yet left entirely untouched by what is going on throughout the country. We would, therefore, ask Government to postpone the operation of the Act for at least six months and to adopt measures for spreading a knowledge of its provisions in the districts by asking Mámlatdárs, school-masters and headmen of castes to convene meetings for the purpose. Some of the out-and-out advocates of the Bill have attempted to minimise the difficulties surrounding the question of determining whether a girl has in any particular instance attained the age of twelve. Among the lower classes the difficulty is a very serious one, and in this opinion we shall be supported by every professional man who has the least experience of the people in the Mofussil. It, therefore, behoves Government to improve and widen the present system of registration of births. The necessity for this reform once more clearly shows how social and administrative reforms are inter-dependent upon each other, and as Government professes to be guided by considerations of humanity and justice in legislating for the protection of immature girls, it cannot in consistency honestly postpone the reform of the Legislative Councils, the police organization and the system of registration. It is scarcely reasonable to expect 250 millions of people to accept a legislative measure concerning their domestic arrangements in an uncomplaining manner, when they are represented by only three Native members in the Council. Anything more preposterous can hardly be conceived, and our Anglo-Indian critics will now see that the Congress programme is not after all such an unmeaning and unsubstantial thing as they are often inclined to treat it.

Magnitude of the opposition to the Age of Consent Bill.

13. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 22nd February, writes:—"What will be the fate of the Age of Consent Bill?" is a very pertinent question to ask at this time and it is not very easy to reply to it. The memorials that are being adopted every day in the different towns of the Empire differ from each other in many particulars, but they all agree in one point, viz., that the proposed legislation will interfere with the social and religious practices of the people—be they Hindus or Mahomedans. The Viceroy and

Members of his Council, except the Honourable Mr. Nulkar, gave the country to understand that the Government of India, "as at present advised," thought the proposed amendment of Section 375 of the Indian Penal Code involved no direct or indirect violation of religious or social practices of any section of Her Majesty's subjects, and it was on this understanding that this legislation was undertaken. The ground under their feet has, however, been cut and it is impossible that the Bill can now stand. The Viceroy and his colleagues must have by this time clearly seen that the handful of well-meaning but all the same misguided reformers were misleading the Government of India into a dangerous position and the sooner they declare their convictions the better will it be for them. Poona, they say, is nothing if not original, and the proceedings of the public meeting of Sunday last most unmistakeably show that this historical city still continues to enjoy its position of being the leading town of the Deccan. It has during the last half a century and more been the centre not only of political activities, but of social, educational and commercial activities also. The powerful and timely protest of the people of Poona saved the Marátha State of Baroda. The telling letters about the Deccan Famine brought to light the terrible mortality that prevailed and shamed Government into taking prompt and vigorous action. The iniquity involved in the Mámlatdárs' Indemnity Bill was fully exposed and this city claims the credit of it, and we are proud to say that if any deadly blow from this part of the country has yet been struck at the Age of Consent Bill, it is due to this city and to the grand meeting of Sunday last. After giving summary of the speeches of other speakers at the meeting the paper says:—Dr. Ganesh Krishna Garde, a graduate of the University, a man of wide experience, sound learning and extensive practice, agreed in holding that the present Bill, if passed, would encourage the rapacious tendency in lustful husbands and cases of earlier cohabitation would increase rather than decrease. He advocated that if any test must be prescribed by legislation, the nature's test of puberty was decidedly better than any numerical test of age. He then spoke on the question of Sati. He held, and supported his conviction with facts, that Government had not been able to suppress Sati; what they had suppressed was the ceremonial portion of it only. He cited instances in which wives did put an end to their lives simultaneously with the death of their husbands, and observed that they were as good instances of Sati as in old days, and demonstrated that if the present law did succeed in doing anything, it would extinguish the ceremonial part of consummation but would leave cohabitation practically untouched. Improvements forced by legislation, he observed, never prosper; they only shut the evil from gaze and give rise to more serious ones.

14. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 23rd February, writes:—

A dodge of the opponents of the Age of Consent Bill and a caution to Government in the matter.

A dodge of the opponents of the Age of Consent Bill, which it is necessary to caution Government against at this juncture, is a proposal to postpone the passing of the measure to the next Legislative Session. The dodge is quite transparent. The postponement will remove from the Council two of the best friends of the Bill—the Honourable Sir Andrew Scoble and the Honourable Ráo Bahádur Nulkar, who has made himself obnoxious to Bengal orthodoxy as "the Poona Bráhmin." We regret some of our Bengal contemporaries have been taken in by the dodge. The Statesman and the Mirror have expressed their concurrence with the proposal. But we do not see what purpose the postponement will serve. The opponents have said all they had to say. They could hardly have anything more to say in defence of their position. They have had their meetings and their memorials. A further postponement will only keep up the fire smouldering, and prevent the people on the two sides from co-operating in other useful objects. If the Bill is immediately passed into law, the opponents will soon reconcile themselves to the new position, and the sores will be healed up. Surely Government cannot be taxed with any precipitateness or undue haste! The question has been publicly discussed from all points of view for the last two years, and there is probably no section of the community which has not been made fully cognizant of it. The five weeks' limit, therefore, which the Government has allowed to the Select Committee, is quite ample for its deliberations, and at the end of the time allowed the Bill will be quite ripe for passing into law.

15. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 22nd February, writes:—We are sorry to see that Dr. Bhándárkar has not yet replied to the letter of Mr. Tilak published in our last issue. The letter was intended for publication in the Times of India in reply to the challenge of Dr. Bhándárkar which had appeared in it. We shall not judge of the conduct of the Times of India in publishing the challenge of the learned Doctor, and withholding a reply to that challenge. We hope that Dr. Bhándárkar will not take shelter behind this subterfuge, namely, that the reply did not appear in the paper in which his challenge was given. We took care to send Mr. Tilak's reply to him, so he cannot say he has not seen it. We know Dr. Bhándárkar to be an honest man. He has the courage of his convictions. If therefore he has a reply to make, let him publish it under his own signature. If he cannot rebut the evidence brought forward by Mr. Tilak, let him say so with manly frankness. The Shástris of Poona too have, we learn, sent him a challenge saying that they are prepared to enter into a discussion with him, according to the rules of discussion, in open meeting. We have not yet heard what answer he has sent them. This silence is very strange. Should we interpret it as silence in such matters is generally interpreted? No, we shall wait for one week more and see if any reply be forthcoming. So far with regard to Mr. Tilak's reply. Now we would go further and ask the learned Doctor to produce express texts from any of the authorities he has mentioned in favour of his contention that the Garbhádhána ceremony may be performed on any ritu. Let us not depend upon mere inference now. In connection with this subject it is interesting to observe that on our side the supporters of the Bill have begun to feel that the ground from under their feet is giving way in regard to the Shástric point. A few of them saw how the discussion of the Shástric aspect would end, and they generally only introduced the Shástric aspect as a secondary one. Others are now openly giving up the Shástric ground and taking up a strong position with regard to the humanitarian point of view. This is significant. Some of them have indirectly admitted that the interpretation of the Shástras by Mr. Tilak is a correct one. This is of the greatest importance and it remains to be seen what attitude the Government of India will now take. The reformers on our side are now blaming Mr. Scoble for having attached any importance to the Shástric aspect and for having made the support of the Shástras one of the grounds for introducing the Bill. The Viceroy, too, declared that the policy of non-interference would be strictly maintained. He went so far as to declare that the Government of India were not going to yield to the demand for legislation made in Mr. Malabári's appeal in regard to other matters, such as minimum marriageable age, divorce, &c., because that would mean interference with religious customs. How then will His Excellency act now that it has been shown that the present Bill involves interference with a religious practice?

The controversy between Dr. Bhándárkar and Mr. Tilak on the Shástric aspect of the Age of Consent Bill and the duty of Government in the matter.

16. The Sudhárak (19), in its issue of the 23rd February, publishes a letter from Dr. R. G. Bhándárkar, in which the Doctor states that Mr. Tilak has not brought forward a single statement from any Nibandha or Prayoga, with the exception of the Chaturvinshatimata, directing the consummation of marriage immediately after the first course, and complains of studied discourtesy having been shown to him by Mr. Tilak in the controversy.

Dr. Bhándárkar's opinion on the Shástric texts cited by Mr. Tilak.

17. The Hindi Punch (107), in its issue of the 22nd February, gives a cartoon, calling it "Madame Folly's Great Circus in Mád (hava) Bág," which seems to represent several promoters of the meeting held on the 8th instant at Mádhav Bág, Bombay, to oppose the Age of Consent Bill as mules. The letter-press runs as follows:—

The promoters of the Mádhav Bág meeting ridiculed in a cartoon.

"'Tis too much proved—that, with devotion's visage,
And pious action, we do sugar o'er
The devil himself."

Mr. Fillis is among us with his admirably trained horses, who obey their trainer's whip. But Madame Folly has been showing something better—a lot of educated mules, who, at the merest sign, kick up their heels in the air and raise a tremendous storm of dust!

18. The Dnyánodaya (12), in its issue of the 26th February, writes :—

The meeting of the supporters of the Age of Consent Bill held at Javer Bág, Bombay, considered a great success.

The meeting held on Sunday last at Javer Bág in support of the Sir Andrew Scoble Bill was in every way a great success. Those who called the meeting were men of recognized weight and representatives of the advanced intelligence of this Presidency. The speeches were marked by moderation, and will carry the weight of common sense. The false cry that the Bill will interfere with the Hindu religion was fully exposed, and the Bill was welcomed as being in the direction of true reform in the interests of the people. The Government of India cannot but feel supported by this meeting, which will more than counteract the many noisy and unreasonable demonstrations that have put themselves in opposition to the Bill.

19. In alluding to the mass meeting of Hindu supporters of Sir Andrew Scoble's Bill held on Sunday the 22nd instant at Javer Bág, Kálbádevi Road, Bombay, for the purpose of adopting a memorial to His Excellency the Viceroy in Council in favour of the object and principle of the Bill, the Bombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 24th February, says :—The meeting was attended by the leading Hindu inhabitants of the island and the supporters of the Bill had congregated in large numbers. The meeting was thus both in intellectual and numerical strength a complete success which Bombay deserves to be complimented upon. At this intelligent gathering, the reasons in favour of the Bill, as well as the mistakes of the opposition to it, were placed before the audience and a complete approval of the object and principle of the measure was expressed. It was shown by the Honourable Mr. Jhaverilál Umiáshankar Yájnik, the president at the meeting, who is a good Sanskrit scholar, and much respected by the orthodox Hindus for being proud of Hindu religion, that a reasonable and intelligent interpretation of the Shástras prescribes the postponement of the Garbhádhána ceremony for some time after the first menstruation, and that this construction is supported by the A'ryan Medical Science; that this ceremony is deferred for months together after the first appearance of the physical condition among the people of Maháráshtra; that in Gujarát, Káthiáwár and Kutch this ceremony is quite unknown, and among the Bráhmins and a few other classes is performed at the first pregnancy of a woman; that the same practice prevails among the Hindus in Rájputána, while the ceremony is not performed at all among the Hindus of the North-West Provinces and Behár. It was also shown at the Javer Bág meeting that the Protected Age Bill was quite in consonance with Hindu religion and usage, humanity, justice and administrative principles of the British Indian Government. It is to be hoped that the prayer made at the conclusion of the memorial for materially reducing the punishment provided in the Bill in the cases where an offence is committed by a husband against his wife will be acceded to by Government, which it is trusted will duly consider the resolution passed at the meeting in connection with the prosecution of the offending husband except on the sworn complaint of the outraged girl or any of her relatives or her guardian. [The Jáme Jamshed (109), in its issues of the 24th and 27th February, expresses similar sentiments.]

20. About the Bombay meeting in support of the Age of Consent Bill the Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 23rd February, writes :—

Comparison between Mádhav Bág and Javer Bág meetings.

The opponents spared no pains to obstruct the efforts of the organizers of the meeting. What with counter-leaflets, sensational placards about religion in danger posted side by side with the bills of the supporters' meeting and a counter-meeting at the Mádhav Bág at the same hour, the opponents strove hard to divert the attention of the people. But in spite of all these distractions the people mustered strong—all classes, sects and castes of the Hindu community being present in thousands, testifying to the prevailing good sense of the community. The whole assembly was animated with such evident enthusiasm that it would have gladdened Sir Andrew Scoble's heart if he had been present to see that not a small portion of the educated and enlightened Hindu community of Bombay fully appreciated his Bill and cordially supported it. The enthusiasm found a particularly happy expression when the Honourable Mr. Justice Telang entered the hall. The audience is estimated to number about four thousand, but whatever the actual numbers, it is certain that not a nook or corner of the capacious hall and grounds of the Javer Bág was left unoccupied, and there was literally no standing room for many late comers who had to leave the place in disappointment. Large and crowded as was the audience, it was select, being almost entirely composed of educated men, all men of light and leading in their respective castes. The speakers were especially select men, men distinguished in their various walks of life, and representing the wealth and intelligence of Bombay. Not a caste or calling but had its representative. Altogether the meeting may be pronounced one of the best Bombay has had for many a year. Compared with its rival of the Mádhav Bág held a few weeks ago, it was incomparably superior. In point of intelligence and social status of the audience, as well as of the speakers, it was decidedly superior. The proceedings were so orderly that nearly every one of the speeches could be heard to the farthest end of the hall, whereas at Mádhav Bág the audience was so uproarious that the speeches were not heard a few yards off. At Javer Bág, too, some unruly spirits from the other side had got admission and tried to make a disturbance, but the general audience would not tolerate it. There were signs of impatience, especially at the close of the meeting, when a speaker was not audible, but generally when a speaker had something to say worth listening to, and said it well, he was heard attentively. There were letters and telegrams of sympathy with the meeting from many men of position in Bombay and up-country who were not able to attend. On the whole, the number of the audience, their character and intellectual capacity, the high character and position of the speakers, the orderliness of the proceedings, and a multitude of attendant circumstances, ought to leave no doubt in the mind of the Government of India and the Legislature which way the verdict of Bombay lies regarding the Age of Consent Bill. The speeches were all excellent, short, and pithy and eloquently delivered. The Chairman, the Honourable Mr. Javerilál Umiáshankar Yájnik, gave the cue to the whole proceedings by making an earnest and eloquent speech, putting the different points clearly, and meeting the objections on the religious and social grounds. Such was the meeting which vindicated the good name of Bombay, and rescued our people from the deep stain which threatened to attach to them in consequence of the proceedings at Mádhav Bág a few weeks ago. In fact, the back of the opposition in Bombay may well be considered to be broken. A counter-meeting at Mádhav Bág held at the same hour was, judging from reports, most miserably attended, and was held apparently for the sole purpose of giving Mr. Jinsiwále an opportunity to orate. A movement which is based on unreason, blind superstition, and mad fanaticism is doomed to be shattered to pieces. The party, on the other hand, which has reason and humanity for its guiding stars has asserted itself and awaked the sense of the community. Government need have no further misgiving on the matter. Bombay has spoken with a voice that cannot be mistaken. Poona had a meeting of ladies yesterday and will have its public meeting on Wednesday next. Ahmednagar has had its meeting too. At other places also there is a large body of respectable opinion distinctly in favour of the Bill. Now we say without hesitation that so far as our Presidency is concerned, Government has every warrant for proceeding with the Bill. The other provinces, except Bengal, are comparatively silent. Bengal has indeed taken up a violently hostile position, but it has overdone its part, and its very exaggeration is its strongest condemnation. On the whole, therefore, let us once more ask Government to firmly and resolutely carry out its measure without delay, making any necessary amendments in procedure, and punishment, but maintaining the principle inviolate.

21. The Native Opinion (16), in its issue of the 26th February, writes:—

The amendment which Dr. Kunte, B.A., M.D., intended to propose at the meeting held at Javer Bág, Bombay, in support of the Age of Consent Bill.

Dr. Anna Moreshwar Kunte, B.A., M.D., intended to move at the recent meeting held at Javer Bág, Bombay, in support of the Age of Consent Bill, that the limit of the period of puberty should be substituted for the arbitrary age-limit of twelve, but he was not allowed to do so. Some of Dr. Kunte's reasons for the amendment are given in the following lines. It is evident that the real object of the Bill, which we take to be the protection of all married girls from the evil effects of premature cohabitation, is not effectively or even in a great measure served by fixing 12 as the limit of age; for, we think that it is beyond question that at least on this side of India many girls do not attain the stage fit for cohabitation before 13 or 14. This class will, therefore, remain unprotected as being beyond the pale of the proposed enactment, and as Government is going wisely to protect girls without distinction of caste or creed, there appears to be no sound reason why a large class should be left out of consideration. We do not mean by this that Government should raise the age to 13 or 14 because it is now admitted on all hands that it is not desirable to do this on religious or other grounds, but what we desire is that the limit of age should be such as is indicated by nature and also by physiological considerations, and this age, we think, should be the period of puberty. It is a fact which becomes apparent without any critical medical tests. Medical authorities are not against cohabitation with a wife who has attained puberty, and fixing that as the limit we shall not be doing violence to the feelings of those who are now opposed to the Bill, but for whose benefit the Bill is to become law. From a legal point of view, also, this limit will take away many of the objections of those who are against it, as it will be easy to prove without any vexatious medical examination that a girl has or has not attained the proposed limit. It is thus less uncertain than any arbitrary limit of age. It is also worthy of note that some of our European friends are of the same opinion. Mr. Risley, of B. C. S., who has written a very learned article on the subject in one of the numbers of Blackwood's Magazine, suggests the same thing. The late Sir Maxwell Melville, one of the ablest High Court Judges and Councillors that this Presidency has had, was strongly of opinion that any arbitrary limit of age in such matters was sure to work mischief and oppression, and his opinion was adopted by the Government of Sir James Fergusson at the time. The statistics given by Sir Andrew Scoble and our friends Messrs. Khare, Chandávarkar and Munsi in their note of request, show that it is only five out of a hundred girls that attained puberty before twelve and not more. The result then of our proposal will rather tend to further the object of protection to girls in 95 cases, which is clear gain. We hope, therefore, that for these reasons and others that may occur to you, you will support the resolution which we wish to propose.

Comments on the Javer Bág meeting of the supporters of the Age of Consent Bill.

22. The Gujaráti (84), in its issue of the 22nd February, observes:—The Hindu reformers have seen their mistake and have proposed two amendments, which they are to move at the meeting to be held at Javer Bág this evening. These amendments are reduction of punishment in the case of an offending husband and a provision that "no process should issue except on the sworn complaint of such person as the court (for reasons to be recorded in writing) considers to be a fit and proper person to make a complaint under the circumstances of the case." These amendments are vague and cannot be accepted by the public. To-day's meeting of the supporters of the Bill is likely to do no good to the people unless the former request Government to introduce a new section inflicting only a nominal punishment in the case of an offending husband.

A second monster meeting held at Mádhav Bág in Bombay to protest against the Age of Consent Bill.

23. The Rajyabhakta (120), in its issue of the 24th February, observes:—A large meeting of about 6,000 Hindus was held on the 22nd instant at Mádhav Bág, Bombay, under the presidency of Pandit Jaykrashnaji. Mahamahopádhyáyas Bhimáchárya and Rájárám Shástri, Pandit Nánurám Sharma, Mr. Jinsiwále, lately a Professor in the Dr. Wilson College, and several others spoke at great length condemning the Age of Consent Bill and refuting the arguments of the Honourable Mr. Justice Telang and Professor Bhándárkar in favour of the Bill. A letter from Goswámi Shri Vithleshji, a Vallabháchárya Maháráj, residing in Bombay, sympathising with the object of the meeting, was read and the assembly expressed approval of the memorial adopted at a meeting held at the same place on the 8th instant. The President was authorised to send a telegraphic report of the meeting to His Excellency the Viceroy.

Disapproval of the Age of Consent Bill.

24. Several other newspapers have this week also written against the Age of Consent Bill praying His Excellency Lord Lansdowne to listen to the advice tendered by Conservative English newspapers like the St. James' Gazette and to give up the Bill, which, they say, has displeased so much both Hindus and Mahomedans. The Poona Vaibhava (55), writing in its issue of the 22nd February on the same subject, expresses its inability to understand why Government should show for Indian women so much sympathy in the matter of marriage consummation, when they have none of it for the Indian people in general in respect of forest, ábkári, salt, land revenue and other matters which are prolific sources of misery to the poor rayats in a thousand and one ways. The Age of Consent Bill, adds the paper, would, if passed, only serve to outrage the modesty of Indian women, to irritate the people and to involve Government in trouble, since all rulers, who, like the last Peshwa and Tipu Sultán, meddled with delicate matters concerning women, came to grief, as is amply proved by Indian and other history, and it is meet that Government should withdraw the proposed Bill and spare themselves the curses of the people.

25. The same paper, in another place, says that the controversy on the Age of Consent Bill has turned the heads of the people and made them so mad that though usually meek and patient, they have begun to kick and bite each other. Persons who have had an English education despise others and have thereby created so much heart-burning and irritation that there is no knowing what they may lead to. This Bill has caused a misunderstanding between teacher and pupil, father and son, master and servant, nay even between husband and wife. Probably Government did not like that the Natives should unanimously work in connection with the Indian National Congress and wanted to bring about disunion among them, and if this be the real object of Government in bringing forward this Bill, it has been accomplished wonderfully well through the instrumentality of brainless reformers.

26. The same paper refers to two meetings recently held at Poona by the Mahomedans and the Shrávak Hindus in their respective place of worship in protest of the Age of Consent Bill, and indignantly asks the reformers, whom it calls senseless men, how many people would they like to tyrannise over?

27. The Native Opinion (16), in its issue of the 22nd February, observes:—The innumerable memorials adopted at public meetings that are being sent from different places in disapproval of the Age of Consent Bill plainly indicate the direction of the current of public opinion on the Bill, and yet, strange to say, the reformers are attempting to show that educated public opinion is in favour of the Bill. Really speaking, the handful of reformers, who are in favour of the measure, is opposed by almost the whole Indian people, who disapprove of it. The dissenting body has among it many graduates, great officers, pensioners and other educated people, and it is sheer hallucination to suppose that the side of the reformers is more weighty and influential. On the contrary, the opposing force is predominant in numbers, influence and every other respect. If attempts at baffling the opponents by unfair means, and espousing a cause simply with a view to please Government, and behaviour suited to the chances of success in the end, are factors which give importance to anybody, then the reformers may be credited with ample importance and influence. Otherwise their side is weaker than that of the anti-legislationists.

28. The same paper, in its issue of the 26th February, writes exultingly of the second meeting of the opponents of the Bill held at Mádhav Bág, Bombay, and finds fault with that of its supporters held on the same day, the 22nd February, at Javer Bág, Bombay, to adopt a memorial to Government in support of the Age of Consent Bill, saying:—Half of about a thousand people assembled at Javer Bág were only spectators who had gone there not to support the Bill, but simply for the sake of amusement, and were against the Bill as is evident from the fact that only three hundred signatures were secured on the spot for the Bill. The legislationists committed a great mistake in asking the Honourable Mr. Javerilál Umiyáshankar Yájnik to preside at the meeting, for this gentleman had on the occasion of the first Mádhav Bág meeting in 1886 expressed in writing to the late Ráo Sáheb V. N. Mandlik, who then presided at the meeting, his firm conviction about the mischievousness of Government interference in social matters. Mr. Yájnik also was wrong to accede to the request and yield to the pressure put upon him by the reformers in consenting to preside and thereby compromising himself. Moreover, the meeting could well have selected the Honourable Mr. Justice Telang as its President, but unfortunately for the legislationists this honourable gentleman seemed to recede from the cause after the preliminary meeting. At the Javer Bág meeting he put in only a nominal appearance long after the proceedings had been commenced and made no speech. This withdrawal of the honourable gentleman is really unaccountable. Perhaps, being a High Court Judge he preferred to keep himself neutral and not to commit himself to any particular side. The local dailies have been from the beginning wedded to the cause of the Bill and have naturally given exaggerated accounts of the Javer Bág meeting. The Gazette even went so far as to state that a few ladies attended the meeting, when the fact was that a few women from the adjacent houses were standing in the galleries of their houses and looking on the proceedings of the meeting without intending to add the weight of their presence to it. The legislationists did another thing which detracts from their professions of love of truth, and it is this, that they did not allow Dr. Anna Moreshwar Kunte, M.D., to propose an amendment which he was about to do.

29. The Kesari (44), in its issue of the 24th February, expresses very much the same sentiments, and adds that it is very significant that there is not a single reformer who approves of the Age of Consent Bill as it is, and who does not propose an amendment or two, as is amply proved by the proceedings at the Javer Bág meeting.

30. The same paper tries to lessen the importance of the ladies' meeting held at Poona in support of the Bill on the 21st idem, saying that the invitation cards did not specify the purpose for which the meeting had been called, that some of the ladies signed the memorial very reluctantly under pressure, and that some went away without signing the document.

31. The Mahárashtra Mitra (47), in its issue of the 19th February, says that the British Government knows full well what public spirit the people of India possess and what stuff they are made of, and hence pay no attention whatever to their protestations against the Age of Consent Bill, and advises the people to cease quarrelling among themselves and to do such things as will make Government respect Native public opinion.

32. The Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 26th February, says:—

A meeting of about two hundred gentlemen was held at Sadáshiv Peth, Poona, on the 25th idem, to adopt a memorial to His Excellency the Viceroy in support of the Age of Consent Bill. Only the sympathisers of the Bill were admitted into the building where the meeting was held and admission was refused to those who were against the Bill and children in general. The consequence was that the people who had collected outside the place of the meeting behaved in a disorderly manner and pelted stones, dust, &c., at the persons assembled who were, therefore, obliged to hurry on their work and to take shelter in an adjacent house, as they were precluded from going out unhurt and had to be escorted to their respective houses by the police. Among the disorderly mob were to be seen grown up and well known persons like Messrs. Krishnaráo Bápu Mánde, Editor, Shri Shiváji newspaper, Ganpatráo Ghotavdekar, Editor, Shetkari Journal, Keshavráo Ránade, contractor, Dattopant Behere, landholder, Náráyan Bápuji Kánitkar, a Pleader, Narharpant Paránjpe, a money-lender, &c.

33. The Káthiáwár Times (3), in its issue of the 26th February, writes:—The accounts of a meeting at Poona of the supporters of the Age of Consent Bill, which we publish in our telegraphic columns, are significant enough; and it is to be hoped that the Viceroy will drop the Bill unless he is prepared to meet the consequences which will follow the present wide-spread agitation. Ultimately, we fear, somebody will have to be hanged.

34. In alluding to the public meeting held by the orthodox Hindus at Surat on the 19th February to protest against the Age of Consent Bill, the Gujarát Mitra (85), in its issue of the 22nd February, disapproves of its proceedings and the speeches made on the occasion and says that the arguments used in the memorial adopted were generally those put forward by the opponents of the Bill, and that very few of the audience could understand what was said in English.

A meeting of the Bráhmins held at Surat to protest against the Age of Consent Bill.

35. A correspondent of the Gujarátí (84), in its issue of the 22nd February, observes:—A large and influential meeting of learned orthodox Bráhmins was held at Vithalvádi at Surat on the 14th instant to protest against the Age of Consent Bill. It was attended by several Native officials and educated Bráhmins, some of whom are well known for their reformed views. There were present Messrs. Nandshankar Tuljáshankar, ex-Diwán of Cutch, Vidyárám Motirám, late Sir Nyáyádhish, Bhávnagar, and several others. The proceedings of the meeting lasted for nearly four hours and a memorial protesting against the Bill was unanimously adopted.

The Age of Consent Bill and the Mahomedans at Bombay.

36. The Bombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 23rd February, observes:—It is highly gratifying that a conference of Messrs. Rahimtula Mahomed Sayáni, Sulleman Abdul Vahed, the Honourable Mr. Fázalbhái Vishrám and other leading members of the Mahomedan community in Bombay should have been recently held for expressing their approval of the Protected Age Bill and for resolving to take steps to explain to each Mahomedan community through its representative the benefits derivable from the Bill being passed into a law. That the Bill does not contravene the precepts of the Mahomedan law has been asserted by those Mahomedan gentlemen who have expressed approval of the Bill as well as by such as have desisted from giving any opinion on the subject. It is also observed by them that Islámism permits the marriage of girls from the age of seven and upwards, and the Bill does not interfere with this permission and simply requires that the age of consent should be raised to twelve years. It is to be hoped that the labours resolved upon at the conference will succeed in enlightening the ignorant portion of that community on the real object of the Bill.

37. The Rást Goftár (88), in its issue of the 22nd February, writes:—What have the Mahomedans to do with the age of protection that they should memorialize the Viceroy against the Bill? We are not, of course, speaking of the whole Mahomedan community or any considerable section of it. We speak of a few only. In these days, fifty or a hundred men meet, pass a resolution and send a petition to Government and call that the voice of India. The four or five dozen Musalmáns who lately met and voted a petition against the Bill in the name of "the Mahomedans of Bombay," only followed a prevailing fashion, originated, we presume, by the three tailors of Tooley Street. Mr. Abdulla Meherali Dharamsey has done well in exposing the real character of the meeting in the public papers. He calls upon the educated and enlightened portion of the community to raise their voice and show that the Bill has their sympathy and support. There is small need for that, we think, if Government will only take the voice of unreason at no more than its proper worth.

Meeting held at Násik and Miraj to protest against the Age of Consent Bill.

38. The Native Opinion (16), in its issue of the 26th February, writes:—Both at Násik and Miraj monster meetings were held to protest against the Age of Consent Bill. Resolutions against the Bill were adopted and memorials to that effect will be shortly addressed to the Government.

The recent Act adding Section 560 to the Code of Criminal Procedure, approved.

39. The Bombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 26th February, approves of the recent Act cancelling Section 250 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and adding a provision for compensating the accused person acquitted by a Magistrate both in summons and warrant cases, by directing the complainant to pay him a certain sum for having brought a frivolous or vexatious charge, observing that the enactment of such a provision was a long felt necessity and will serve materially in lessening the number of vexatious accusations and protecting innocent persons from undeserved persecution.

PART III.—Education.

A complaint against the course of study and standards of examinations fixed by the Bombay University.

40. The Din Bandhu (10), in its issue of the 22nd February, writes :—We are told in the life of William Tell, the hero of Swiss independence, that the ruling tyrant Gesler, to make his dignity and power respected, compelled his slavish subjects to bow with bended knees before his cap which was exhibited in the open market stuck up on a pole. We have in our midst such a tyrant in the local University. This august body has always entertained a great idea of its own importance, dignity and power. The "Standard" or pole of the University has been raised now to an altitude at which it is doubtful whether the cap will be visible to the fascinated creatures kissing the ground. Speaking seriously, we fail to see the good that has resulted from the gradual raising of the standard of University Examinations. Many a plucked student from this city has come out successful through foreign Universities, of which it cannot be said that they are managed by Senates inferior to ours. And yet compare the graduates of this place with those of other countries,—how rich are the latter in genius? The Indian student's energy is consumed by the grinding nature of the studies prescribed and the result is the poor product—a combination of cram and conceit which we all so much deplore. The dearth of authors and scientific men capable of directing their thoughts to researches for which a wide field exists in this undeveloped country, has long been lamented, and the want is not likely to be supplied so long as the present educational policy continues in the hands of experimentalists who cannot in any sense be regarded as experts. Some of these experimentalists are sincere and some may be found among them whose honesty of purpose cannot be impeached; on the other hand there are those who having in earlier times won University honours and ever since led a prosperous career and having no sons to pass through the ordeal, do not care how they handicap education; whilst others, again, earning a precarious livelihood, through the severe competition of the day, think it no doubt in their interests to close the doors of the University still more effectually. The true spirit of local self-government is absent from our University as it is from the management of the Municipality. We hear of impending changes in the present University Act. No changes will be so welcome to the public as those tending to concentrate more power into the hands of Government for timely interference on occasions when the vagaries of the Senate lead that body astray to the detriment of true education.

Approval of the speech delivered by His Excellency Lord Harris at the opening ceremony of Sir D. M. Petit Gymnastic Institution.

41. The Gujarâti (84), in its issue of the 22nd February, writes :—It was a very fortunate coincidence that His Excellency Lord Harris, who is so great a patron of athletics and other kinds of out-door sports, should have been called to open the Sir D. M. Petit Gymnastic Institution and thus complete the work initiated by his eminent predecessor. We welcome His Excellency's speech delivered on the occasion as an authoritative declaration of the policy of the supreme Government in relation to the physical education of the rising generation of India. It gives us sincere pleasure to know that the Bombay Government are making systematic inquiries with a view to ascertain the requirements of schools and extend the benefits of physical education as far as possible by lending increased pecuniary support and improving the quality of instruction. Lord Harris also announced a gratifying departure in the educational policy hitherto followed by proposing to alter the Grant-in-Aid Code so as to admit of grants-in-aid for play-grounds. The increased attention that Government is paying to the physical side of our educational system is a distinct recognition of the necessity for developing a healthy mind in a healthy body, and though it is a tardy one, we say with His Excellency "Better late than never." Lord Harris will be sorry to learn that in the Mofussil there are teachers who would punish boys if they were found swimming in a river or pursuing any other form of physical activity. We hope this mischievous interference on the part of ignorant school-masters will cease in future, and that they will encourage the cultivation of out-door recreation by their actual participation in games or by their presence on the play-ground, as suggested by His Excellency. It is impossible to rear a strong and enduring intellectual superstructure on a weak physical foundation and we are confident that before Lord Harris leaves this Presidency measures will be taken to impress this wholesome doctrine on the teachers and their pupils in schools in the Mofussil.

The present condition of the Dhárwár High School.

42. A correspondent writing to the Karnátak Patrika (138), in its issue of the 23rd February, says that the condition of the Dhárwár High School had never been worse during the last 18 years than what it is at present, lays all the blame on the present Head Master, Mr. H. B. Keskar, and advises the people to take timely steps in this matter before the school is closed in accordance with the policy of curtailing expenditure adopted by Government.

PART IV.—Native States.

The Cambay Riots case in Parliament.

43. The Bombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 26th February, says:—The general public was desirous that steps should be taken to secure justice in the matter of the Cambay disturbance of September last, and it is gratifying that the matter has been carried to Parliament, Dr. Hunter having undertaken to lay it properly before the House. The late lamented Mr. Bradlaugh was to have done this good work, but in his absence Dr. Hunter will prove as good an advocate as the deceased Member for Northampton. It is to be hoped that the part taken by the late Political Agent of Cambay in the armed attack made on the assembled rayats on the morning of the 19th September last, the criminal trial held by the same officer of the rayats arrested and accused of having committed a riot, and his refusal to admit such evidence as would throw light on the innocence of the accused,—all these matters will be subjected to a searching discussion in the House; and should this discussion result in the liberation of the incarcerated rayats the public would be much gratified.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

This year's list of new Justices of the Peace in Bombay considered satisfactory.

1. The Din Bandhu (10), in its issue of the 1st March, says that almost all the persons nominated Justices of the Peace this year are deserving of the honour done to them, and that His Excellency Lord Harris deserves praise for selecting for the honour a gentleman from the Marátha community which has been long neglected. The paper adds that the number of Justices of the Peace in the Marátha and other backward communities is comparatively very small, and recommends the names of Messrs. Jávji Dádáji, proprietor of the Nirnaya Ságar Press, Jáyá Karhádi Lingu, a contractor and a Member of the Bombay Municipal Corporation, and Vyanku Báluji, general contractor, for the same favour next year.

List of the new Justices of the Peace for Bombay found fault with.

2. In alluding to the list of the new Justices of the Peace for the Town and Island of Bombay, the Gujaráti (84), and the Kaiser-i-Hind (87), in their issues of the 1st March, observe with regret that several unworthy nominations are to be met with therein, while several merchants, solicitors, pleaders and others who encourage education by various means and those that advocate the interests of the rate-payers of Bombay at the Corporation's meetings have not found a place in this list.

Suggestions regarding the Forest Rules.

3. The Chandrodaya (137), in its issue of the 28th February, says that Government should frame rules to relieve the poor rayats from the loss and misery inflicted on them by the rigidity of the existing Forest Rules. The new rules, adds the paper, should permit the poor rayats (1) to cut down bushes for the purpose of fencing their fields, (2) to gather leaves and berries of certain trees for maintaining themselves by the proceeds of their sale, and (3) to hunt down wild animals in the forests.

A prayer to Government to restrict the sale of opium at Bombay.

4. The Satyavakta (123), in its issue of the 6th March, observes:—About 50 persons annually commit suicide at Bombay by taking an over-dose of opium, and hence Governmen ought to prohibit the licensed opium-sellers from selling more than a specified quantity of the drug to a single person in a day.

The European burial ground at Dhárwár.

5. The Karnátak Patra (138), in its issue of the 2nd March, writes:—The fact that the European burial ground at Dhárwár is situated in a locality quite contiguous to the town may strike outsiders. We are told that its removal to a distance was recommended to Government by the Sanitary Commissioner more than a year ago, but his recommendation appears to have been shelved, as no steps have been taken to give effect to it. The old practice among the Lingáyets of burying their dead bodies in their Maths which are usually situated on the outskirts of a town or village was peremptorily stopped long ago. If the putrefaction of Lingáyet dead bodies was then offensive to the health of the living, the rottenness of European corpses must also be equally offensive now. We hope Government will take speedy measures to relieve the inhabitants of Dhárwár from the injurious effects arising from the neighbourhood of the burial ground.

A complaint against Mr. Gibbs, Superintendent of Police, Surat.

6. The Gujarát Darpan (83), in its issue of the 5th March, writes:—We understand that Mr. Gibbs, Superintendent of Police, Surat, has issued a circular to his officers and men directing that descriptive rolls of all persons who happen to be accused of an offence should be prepared by the Police after they have been stripped quite naked!! We do not know what earthly reason had Mr. Gibbs for being so whimsical as this. We know that Mr. Gibbs is a young officer with an excess of zeal and very little of prudence! Two years ago he had taken a fancy to issue a notification ordering all music to be stopped after ten o'clock at night which he was at last obliged to withdraw. Our readers may not have forgotten the espionage he kept on those who were adherents of the Congress at Surat and Broach. And taken in their best light these acts of his were arbitrary and unwarranted. We also know his merits. He is zealous, hard-working and a good disciplinarian. But what is most important to the public and what makes a Police officer popular—prudence and regard for the feelings of others—he possesses in a very small degree. We beg to draw the attention of the Commissioner, N. D., and of Government to this act of the Superintendent of Police with the hope that they would administer him such a reprimand that he would cease to play such pranks in future.

An order of the Commissioner, S. D., pronounced to be partial.

7. The Belgaum Samáchár (24), in its issue of the 2nd March, expresses its dissatisfaction at the alleged issue of an order by the Divisional Commissioner directing that the District Collector of Belgaum should see that no disguises are assumed by Hindus at Belgaum during the approaching Shimga holidays, and says that this order is partial and likely to widen the split already existing between the local Mahomedans and Hindus, unless it is made applicable to both of them, and that if the Collector does not protest against the Commissioner's order, the people are bound to bring to the notice of Government the biased conduct of the Commissioner from the beginning in connection with the misunderstanding between the two classes.

Appointments in the Revenue Department in Ahmednagar District found fault with.

8. The Jagadádarshá (15), in its issue of the 1st March, finds fault with the appointment of Mr. Ganesh Bahirav Joshi as Head Clerk to the Mámlatdár of Newása in the Ahmednagar District, saying that there are many men in the department who by their seniority and qualifications have better claims to the place than Mr. Joshi, and that it is very surprising that the District Collector, the Divisional Commissioner, and His Excellency the Governor himself should connive at the frequent failure of justice in this district in the matter of appointments in the Revenue Department.

Degradation of Mr. Shripat Govind Joshi, late Mámlatdár of Haliyál in Dhárwár District, disapproved of.

9. The Dhárwár Vritt (32), in its issue of the 26th February, regrets that Government should have degraded Mr. Shripat Govind Joshi from the Mámlatdárship of Haliyál to the post of Chitnis to the Collector of Kolába for the mismanagement of the estate of a minor in that táluka, and says that as the estate had been mismanaged for several years past by half a dozen Mámlatdárs before Mr. Joshi, Government should not have held the latter alone responsible for it and degraded him in the way they have done. The paper recommends Mr. Joshi's case for the reconsideration of Government.

Alleged death of an enumerator at the last Census in Bombay.

10. The Subodh Patrika (18), in its issue of the 1st March, says that people are murmuring at the annoyance suffered by many and the actual death of one of the persons employed to do Census work this year in the Mahomedan quarters of the City of Bombay, and remarks that an inquiry should be made into these matters and if found true substantial compensation should be given to the family of the deceased.

Rumour about a murder at Worli in Bombay and a suggestion to the Police.

11. The Din Bandhu (10), in its issue of the 1st March, refers to the verdict of death from excessive drinking given by the Coroner's jury at an inquest held on the 26th February 1891 on the body of Bápu Mahádu Sinde, an inhabitant of Worli, Bombay, and says that although it cannot find fault with the verdict of the jury which is given in accordance with the evidence placed before it, it is desirable to suggest to the clever Police of Bombay to find out the real cause of death as it is generally rumoured that the deceased who was very strong was murdered by some persons.

Part II.—Legislation.

Reflections on the Indian Factory Bill.

12. In noticing the refusal of Lord Cross, the Secretary of State for India, to receive a deputation from the Lancashire Cotton Trade relative to the Indian Factory laws, and his statement that he believed that the Indian Government Bill in reference thereto would satisfy all purposes, the Bombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 2nd March, says:—The information already collected on the subject by the Government of India as well as that placed before it by the recent Indian Factory Commission is quite sufficient to put the Government on the right track, enabling it to pass an appropriate amended Factory law. The concessions prayed for by the mill-hands in their evidence before the Factory Commission are such as their employers would not grumble to make, and if the new law gives the sanction of authority to these concessions, there will be no objection whatever to the amended Factory law. The sinister object of the Lancashire cotton manufacturers in getting curtailed the working hours of the Indian mill-labourers is well-known, but the latter have vehemently prayed before the Commission that their working time should not be lessened as any curtailment would be prejudicial to their pecuniary interest, some of them begging hard to be allowed to work for a longer time. Government would therefore do well to confine the amending Factory law to allowing half an hour's recess in the afternoon on every working day and making Sunday a close holiday and sanctioning such arrangements as are recommended by the Factory Commission in regard to child labour. [The Jáme Jamshed (109) and the Akhbáre Sodágar (93) of the same date express similar sentiments.]

13. The Bombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 7th March, says:—It is said that the Indian Factories Bill has been amended to the effect that children should not be made to work more than half a day; that women should not be permitted to perform work for more than ten and a half hours; and that Sundays should be observed as close holidays except under certain conditions when a native holiday falls on a week day. These rules would do no injury to the interests of the mill-owners, but those of the mill hands would considerably suffer. The poor Indian mill-labourer depends for his livelihood on the labour performed by every member of his family, and notwithstanding the amalgamated income of the entire family, leads a poor life. The proposed amended Factory law will, therefore, curtail this poor income and make him more wretched than before. If the mill-owners engage two sets of children, each set working half a day, the children will earn something in the way of their maintenance, but if no such arrangement is made by the mill-proprietors, the children will be a burden and a source of annoyance to their parents, as they will wander about the streets all day. The earnings of female labour in mills will also be curtailed by fixing the limit of their labour to ten and a half hours; and seeing that they cannot get sufficient work out of females the mill-owners will, very likely, employ male labourers in their place, and women will be thrown out of work. Thus there is all likelihood of the selfish sympathy of Lancashire for the Indian mill hands making them poorer than before and quite wretched.

Select Committee's report on the Age of Consent Bill, approved.

14. The same newspaper expresses approval of the recommendations made by the Select Committee on the Age of Consent Bill, and requests the Legislature to adopt the recommendations, observing that they would remove most of the fear entertained from the present Bill by its opponents as well as its supporters.

Mr. Y. V. A'thlye, M.A., LL.B., Judge of the Varishta Court, Baroda, on the Age of Consent Bill.

15. Mr. Y. V. A'thlye, M.A., LL.B., Judge of the Varishta Court, Baroda, publishes a letter in the Native Opinion (16) of the 1st and 5th March on the Age of Consent Bill, in which he says:—My conclusion, in brief, is that the Bill does interfere with a social and religious custom, though to a very small degree, and so far as the petitions of the oppositionists bring this to the notice of Government, I sympathise with their aim. I would, however, tell them to remember that exaggeration in argument or language, even when undoubtedly unintentional, more often weakens than strengthens a case. If they want merely to guard against an attack on their religious customs, let their efforts be confined to asking that an amendment be made in the Bill, whereby cases of husbands whose wives have attained puberty before 12 will be excepted. If their demand exceed this, they would be unwittingly making out a necessity for the Bill and thereby unjustly maligning our community. Let them again remember that an attempt to make out that the commandments are regarded as obligatory is unjust as well as short-sighted. It is unjust because it paints our society in a manner that is not true, and it need hardly be said that Government, as well as people, ought always to forego any good, however great, which cannot be attained without a sacrifice of truth. It is short-sighted because thereby you place the cases of early marriage and premature cohabitation on the same level as those of widow marriage and sati and thereby lend some support to those who advocate legislation. In truth, there is no parallelism whatever between the two cases. There is nothing to gain by not taking Government at their word. They have told us that they have no intention of interfering with our law about marriage which is a composite rite consisting of what is practically a betrothal and of consummation, and our endeavour should only be to show Government that their Bill, in interfering with the latter, does interfere with our marriage law. In advising such a course I am not daunted by the weak fear that we may be open to the charge of trying to perpetuate early cohabitation, a charge that has been actually fulminated by some of our newspapers which were gullible enough to pick up the cry of the claims of humanity. I emphatically deny the charge for the Deccan, and make no doubt the said newspapers will join me as soon as their controversial furor subsides and enables them to attend to facts. I consent not to oppose the second extension of the Bill save in the case of puberty and subject also to certain amendments which will minimise oppression because it will be practically inoperative in our Presidency, and that wherever it will be operative the invocation of the criminal law might be tolerated as enforcing what is alike demanded by the laws of bodily development and the Shástras. By accepting this compromise we shall be rendering to Government all the aid it may reasonably expect from us in enabling it to extricate itself from its disagreeable position which is not exclusively of its own making. Those that have brought about the predicament deserve no thanks from our community, because I cannot but regard them as the worst though possibly unwitting enemies of their people. Addressing myself to Government I would earnestly ask them to pause and ponder whether there is any real evil as regards Indian married life, such as calls for Government interference, and whether there is any analogy between the former occasions when such interference was exercised and the present case. I would exhort Government not to view with impatience the opposition of the people to what is undoubtedly conceived in their interest, nor to allow wrong ideas of prestige to prevail in this matter. A strong Government like that which rules over this country need entertain no morbid fears of its suffering in popular esteem by yielding to popular prayers. In accepting the compromise above suggested the Government will have abandoned only a small portion of its proposal, and yet the effect of it will be to allay the fear of the masses which is real, though enthusiasts will continue to paint it as transitory. That will be merely suiting the dose to the patient and will be a conduct befitting a solicitous but discreet parent. Highest statesmanship lies in securing progress with the least discontent and is accordingly bound in each of its contemplated measures to weigh its likely results both good and bad, and adopt or reject it according as the former may preponderate or be outweighed. Examined by this test the Bill, I am confident, will draw not other verdict from any sober and patient judgment than the one with which I have started, viz., that it is unfortunate and should not be passed, if at all it is needed without its pangs being removed.

16. The Pandit (155), in its issue of the 27th February, says;—The personal opinion of the Pandit is that the Age of Consent Bill should be passed, but it is not willing to enter into a discussion on a disputed point like the Protected Age question. The Bill is duly appreciated by the educated natives, while the ignorant masses think that the measure is an interference of Government in their religion. This opinion of the latter is quite wrong, but few can disabuse their mind of this wrong impression. The cause of the Indian Mutiny of 1857 was trifling and unreal, but the disturbance led to serious consequences. The views entertained by the native militaries and civil population on the passing of the Age of Consent Bill will cause a more extensive disturbance than the mutiny which was confined to Bengal and the native army, since the enactment of the Bill would lead the entire native population of India to believe that Government were interfering in their religious practices, and if this belief is not removed from their minds, a rebellion extending to even the nooks and corners of the country would arise disturbing the public peace and causing great annoyance to Government. It is, therefore, requested that Government should withhold from enacting the Bill until the people are prepared to appreciate it.

A request to Government not to enact the Age of Consent Bill as the whole of the illiterate native population of India, civil as well as military, believe the proposed measure to be an interference with their religions.

Opposition of the Mahomedans to the Age of Consent Bill and their denunciation of the leadership of those among them who have received English education.

17. The Gujarátí (84), in its issue of the 1st March, writes:—The infection of opposition to the Bill is gradually spreading in the Mahomedan community of Bombay. More than a thousand Mahomedans assembled in a meeting this week to protest against the Bill. It is a noteworthy phenomenon that the Hindu and Mahomedan priesthood and their followers have assumed an exactly similar attitude towards the proposed change in the law, while the advanced sections in both the communities have declared that their Shástra or Korán is not antagonistic to it. Meetings have also been held at Poona, Sátára, Mahád and other towns by the leaders of the Mahomedan community in those places to protest against the Bill on the score of religious interference with the injunctions of the Korán. If one is to believe all that is now appearing in some of our Bengal contemporaries, it appears that no inconsiderable section of the Moslem community on the other side of India is opposed to Sir Andrew Scoble's Bill. Opposition on the part of our Mahomedan friends was certainly not expected, and this new element will be an additional factor to be reckoned with in dealing with the complicated situation of affairs that Government will have now to face. Mahomedan oppositionists urge that while the Korán permits them to consummate marriages immediately after the attainment of puberty, the proposed change in the law declares it criminal to do so and sends an offending husband to jail for ten years. They treat the amendment as an unnecessary interference with the injunctions of their religions works, while the educated section of the community holds that there is no injunction, properly so-called, enjoining consummation after puberty. The fact, however, remains that the orthodox Mahomedans disapprove of the change and disclaim the leadership of their educated brethren to represent their wishes to Government, or their authority to interpret their Korán in the way they have done in support of the Bill.

The Age of Consent Bill and a tradition among the Mahomedans about early consummation of his marriage by Prophet Mahomed.

18. The Káside Mumbai (112), in its issue of the 6th instant, gives passages from Bokari Shareef, the recognized book of traditions of the Mahomedans, showing that the Prophet Mahomed married Bibi Aisha (honoured be her name) and consummated his marriage with her when she was nine years old.

Ladies' meetings in support of the Age of Consent Bill.

19. The Subodha Patrika (8), in its issue of the 1st March, writes:—Ladies' meetings in support of the Age of Consent Bill have been held in Poona, Bombay and Ahmedabad during the week. Few women and no mothers of girls would but hail the measure with delight.

A ladies' meeting in Bombay in support of the Age of Consent Bill.

20. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 1st March, writes:—Like Pandita Ramábái's meeting at Poona, the meeting presided over by Mrs. Modak at Bombay is full of significance. Here is a Hindu lady, speaking courageously out for her country-women in the face of the wide world. Well may Mrs. Modak complain that while reason and good sense are being drowned by the clamour of male monopolists on the question of the Age of Consent, the women have had such few opportunities of expressing their opinion. However, better late than never. The opinion of one Hindu lady in this connection is more useful than that of any number of "monstrous" meetings made up of monopolists and their adherents. We are glad to see that the Diwán of Mysore spoke in favour of the Bill at Mrs. Modak's call.

Ladies' meeting in support of the Age of Consent Bill at Ahmedabad.

21. The same newspaper writes:—At Ahmedabad, too, there has been a meeting of Hindu ladies, supporting Sir Andrew Scoble's Bill. These are the best witnesses that could be produced, and it is touching to hear their wail, now and then, where the husbands and fathers are sufficiently enlightened to allow them to bear witness publicly against the terrible wrongs done to their sex in the name of religion. That these poor ladies will be abused and vilified all over the land, goes without saying. But it is equally certain that in years to come they will be ranked amongst martyrs, suffering in person in order to advance a righteous cause.

The Age of Consent Bill controversy.

22. The Poona Vaibhav (55), the Vártáhár (20), the Jagadhitechchhu (15) and the Hindu Panch (35) of this week attack the supporters of the Age of Consent Bill in rather objectionable language for the ladies' meetings held and memorials sent in support of the Age of Consent Bill. Several other papers have also kept up the controversy but the arguments employed for and against the Bill are the same as those already reported.

The Javer Bág meeting of the supporters of the Age of Consent Bill considered a success.

23. The Rást Goftár (88), in its issue of the 1st March, writes:—The great meeting at Javer Bág, Bombay, was an undoubted success. It was a triumph of reason over unreason. It was a vindication of the Shástras from the slur which some of their votaries are casting upon them. It was a vindication of the humanity and good sense of not an inconsiderable section of the Hindu community. Bengal may rave and rant as it pleases. But the sober sense for which Bombay has distinguished itself on some great occasions, in the past, when the minds of men were stirred deeply, has also characterized that great, orderly, and impressive demonstration of Hindus at Javer Bág. The proceedings showed tact and judgment on the part of the promoters of the meeting. They disarmed the argument of the opposition that the Bill might be used as an instrument of oppression and extortion by the police by suggesting that proceedings should only be instituted on the complaint of the outraged girl or her near relatives. There is also much to be said in favour of their prayer that the penalties proposed to be inflicted upon the offending husband might be considerably reduced. The extreme severity of punishment might deter the injured party from lodging a complaint against one nearly related. [The Gujarát Mitra (85) of the same date expresses similar sentiments.]

The Javer Bág meeting of the supporters of the Age of Consent Bill considered a total failure.

24. The Gujaráti (84), in its issue of the 1st March, writes:—Notwithstanding the continuous and prolonged agitation on the part of the supporters of Sir Andrew Scoble's Bill the Javer Bág meeting was but poorly attended. It was neither so largely attended nor so influentially represented as the Mádhav Bág meeting, the number hardly exceeding 1,200. Taking an impartial view of the proceedings, it may be said with truth that the meeting was a failure on the whole. The speeches delivered on the occasion with one or two exceptions were not to the point and by no means up to the mark. The speakers were all compelled to admit more or less that the Bill in its present form was not only quite unacceptable but undesirable. The speeches were, no doubt, eloquent but by no means convincing. Mr. Kirloskar's speech and the one that came from the chair were the only two exceptions. They were not only well received by the audience which mainly consisted of the ardent supporters of the Bill in any form, but their moderation on the whole seems to have met with universal approbation. It is a pleasant feature to note the recommendation made by the meeting to reduce the sentence in the case of offending husbands and to confine the right of initiating prosecutions to a limited class of persons, but we also wish the meeting had at the same time suggested to Government the advisability of framing an independent section for dealing with offences by husbands and depriving Magistrates of their power to entrust inquiries into such offences to the Police. Government have now before them the views of the supporters as well as the opponents of the Bill, and we feel confident they will receive the fullest consideration at their hands before its final passage through the Council.

25. The Subodh Patrika (18), in its issue of the 1st March, writes:—If the opponents of the Age of Consent Bill have not been able to hold an orderly meeting in Bombay, their conduct in Poona towards the supporters of the Bill has even done irreparable damage to their cause. That conduct indeed was disreputable in the extreme, if not worse, so that no Government with a sense of self-respect can allow itself to be influenced by it in the slightest degree. But further, from their own point of view, it ought to pass for a gross tactical blunder. For if these people really thought that the supporters of the Bill were the small minority they represent them to be, what need was there to mob them as they were? Certainly, none of the oppositionists in Poona considered it worth his while to prevent the ladies' meeting, evidently because it was expected to be a very small affair indeed. On the other hand, if they had thought the same of the other meeting, they would have been equally indifferent whether it was held or not. But the elaborate preparations which they made to disturb it and prevent people from attending gives good grounds for the belief that, but for their interference, they feared it would have been fully as large as theirs. In this way, by their fears of the meeting, they have given the lie direct to the statement that the supporters of the Bill are an inconsiderable minority. Have they not then by their shameful conduct on the occasion done even a greater service to the supporters of the Bill than if they had let them alone? As it is, in spite of the mob, quite a respectable number attended to vote a memorial in support of the Bill.

The conduct of the opponents of the Age of Consent Bill towards its supporters at Poona.

26. The Din Bandhu (10), in its issue of the 1st March, writes:—The cowardly conduct of the Poona mob who assaulted the supporters of the Bill at Wednesday's meeting, if allowed to pass unnoticed by the authorities, may lead to fresh outbreaks of fanaticism. In the absence of solid arguments to support their contention the orthodoxy of Poona is resorting to intimidation and boycotting—the last hope of despair. Orthodoxy in many other quarters is also largely taking to mass demonstrations, but nowhere as yet has such a disgraceful scene been witnessed as in Poona. The duty of Government at such a time is clear, and whatever be the ultimate result of their deliberations there is little doubt that mere clamour, violence and outbursts of fanaticism will have no weight with them.

27. The Sudhárak (19), in its issue of the 2nd March, writes:—The conduct of the Police on Wednesday last was disgraceful and cowardly in the extreme if really it was nothing worse. It will hardly be believed, but it is a fact none the less, that some of these men, and especially a petty officer in charge of them, seemed to be wilfully allowing the mob to have its own way. That there was something wrong with these men might be seen from the facts that 15 of them could not control a mob which was dispersed in less than five minutes by only two European Constables, and that all orthodox papers of this place, which have hitherto been trotting out the inefficiency and unscrupulousness of the Police as one of their principal objections to the Bill, and which never miss an opportunity of crying down the Poona Police, are this time vying with each other in awarding praise to these "protectors of public peace" for their zealous and scrupulous discharge of duty on that day! Zealous and scrupulous indeed, when it is remembered that two policemen were actually seen sitting even like unconcerned spectators, while some wretched creatures were doing all sort of damage to chairs and benches within less than a couple of yards from them!

Conduct of the Poona Police.

28. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 2nd March, writes:—There were indeed present at the meeting of the supporters of the Bill at Poona some fifteen Constables under the command of a Jamádár named Phadke, but these protectors of the public peace were apparently intent upon helping the breakers of peace. This Phadke, we learn, took a no inconsiderable part in the protest meeting before the Shanwár Wáda, and did his work at the present meeting in, to say the least, a most half-hearted way. It was only when the Superintendent of Police, Mr. Macpherson, arrived on the spot that the policemen were brought to a sense of their duty, and the cowardly bullies who were disturbing the peace were dispersed like chaff before wind. Mr. Macpherson is determined, we learn, that the matter will not end here. We would certainly desire that the policemen who so shamefully betrayed their trust should be dealt with in an exemplary way. As to outsiders their conduct is in the highest degree reprehensible. It is said Messrs. Námjoshi and Dhárap were at the house within the compound of the Kridábhuvan from 4 o'clock. Mr. Tilak came to the place of the meeting at a little before 6. His arrival was a signal for loud cries of Tilak-ki-jai. When asked at the door why being a pronounced opponent he had come to the meeting, he replied he came to escort the reporter of the Mahrátta and the Kesari who, he feared, would not be admitted and that he himself would not care to be present at the meeting even if allowed. Nevertheless he got into the compound and joined his friends at Mr. Kelkar's house, which it may be noted overlooks the place of meeting and is only nominally a separate place. When Professor Bhándárkar, Ráo Bahádur Bhide and others went to Mr. Kelkar's house at his invitation for taking refuge from the mob they met there Mr. Tilak and others. The mob, who had by this time got into the compound, assailed the refugees with the most filthy and threatening language and were prevented from breaking into the house only by the door being securely fastened on the inside. The Police Jamádár, it is said, had frequent interviews with Mr. Tilak. On one occasion he said to Mr. Tilak, the people say they would disperse if he (Mr. Tilak) told them to do so. The Jamádár repeated the statement, and Mr. Tilak was even once moved to undertake the intercession, but his better genius counselled him not to interfere, and he replied he would not take the responsibility. Meanwhile some of the members of the meeting, who had escaped the fury of the mob, carried the news of the riot to Mr. Macpherson and the latter arrived with a fresh batch of Constables. When he arrived upon the scene he ordered the people to disperse on pain of arrest and the place was cleared in five minutes. The members who had taken shelter in Mr. Kelkar's house were then escorted to their houses by policemen. None of the leading men, we are glad to note, suffered any bodily injury. Thus ended this inglorious fight of reason with blind perversity. Comment is needless upon the facts. We make no suggestions. But we cannot help observing that the opponents by allowing their zeal to outrun their judgment have done the greatest disservice to their cause. We are not yet in a position to say how far the leaders of the opposition were answerable for the doings of their followers. We think probably they are not answerable. But in any case, for the sake of the cause we have at heart, we would not wish that any of the men should be given an opportunity to pose themselves as martyrs. Another meeting should, we think, be held, if possible, at the same place, and Mr. Macpherson, who has, we understand, already promised to make arrangements to keep the peace if a fresh meeting be held, should be informed about it in time. The principle which the supporters desire to assert should be again asserted and the opponents taught a lesson in better manners.

The meeting of the supporters of the Age of Consent Bill at Poona and Mr. Tilak's presence in the Kridábhuvan at the time.

29. The Sudhárak (19), in its issue of the 2nd March, writes:—Mr. Tilak's presence in Mr. Kelkar's house during the time of the meeting was a very unfortunate incident and betokened a lamentable error of judgment on that gentleman's part. We are not prepared to charge Mr. Tilak with encouraging or even sympathising with the mob in their shameful work, but we cannot help feeling that Kridábhuvan was not the place for him on that day. Mr. Tilak is the leader of that section of the Poona people who have taken up an attitude of uncompromising hostility to the Sooble Bill. He has become recently a kind of demigod to the orthodox community of this place, and we think he knows this. He should have seen that his presence in the Kridábhuvan, even as a mere unsympathetic spectator of the meeting, was sure to encourage the mob in its unsympathetic attitude towards the meeting. Mr. Tilak's plea that he went there to escort the reporter of the Mahrátta and Kesari is absolutely and entirely flimsy. Fancy

Mr. Gladstone (to compare very very small things with very very great ones), escorting the reporter of a Liberal paper to a Tory meeting or Lord Salisbury conducting a Police notetaker to an open-air demonstration of Irish Nationalists ! !

Alleged attempt to bring disgrace upon some respectable opponents of the Age of Consent Bill at Poona.

30. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 1st March, writes :—In regard to the meeting of the supporters of the Bill held in the Kridábhuvan at Poona, we are pained to see that an attempt is made to throw the responsibility of the disgraceful conduct of the mob on respectable and innocent parties whose only fault, if it can be so called, is that they are opponents of the Bill. The paper then quotes the telegram from Poona published in the Times of India of the 27th ultimo and says :—Mark the cunning skill with which the whole incident is given. There is no direct charge made out ; evidently an impression is intended to be conveyed that the mob was instigated by Mr. Tilak to do what it did, that it obeyed his orders and wanted his orders for dispersal as if they had come there pursuant to his orders. We say on the best authority that Mr. Tilak had no hand in that day's disgraceful proceedings ; that he could not have controlled the mob ; that we do not believe that the mob was beyond the control of the police, a fact amply demonstrated by the Jamádár himself soon after dispersing the mob. From internal evidence we suspect that the telegram must have emanated from one of the " leading supporters " of the Bill. We challenge him whoever he may be or any of his colleagues to show a particle of reliable evidence connecting Mr. Tilak or Mr. Námjoshi with the affair. It was evidently a dodge, by whom concocted we are not prepared to say, to induce Mr. Tilak to go and address the mob so that his disappointed opponents might have an opportunity to pounce upon him as the leader. The Jamádár was made a tool to set this trap. This dodge is of a piece with the other tactics employed by the other side. [The Kesari (44), in its issue of the 3rd March, expresses similar sentiments.]

Reasons why the mob behaved as they did at the meeting of the supporters of the Age of Consent Bill at Poona.

31. Referring to the anti-reform demonstration in connection with a meeting held at Poona to adopt a memorial in support of the Age of Consent Bill, the Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 1st March, observes :—Looked at from one point of view the whole affair was a disgraceful one. When we contemplate the series of errors committed by the organisers of the meeting we cannot wonder at the result. Rarely has a Poona mob been more rowdy than it is said to have been on that day. People who have lived here for a long time say that Wednesday's affair reminded them of the riot on the occasion of the Dayánand Saraswati's visit to this city. Considering the exasperated state of the feelings of the orthodox party, it was certainly very imprudent to hold the meeting in such an exposed place. This was a direct challenge to the other party. Then the feeling of anger was further fomented by the offensive conduct of some of the promoters. The students, who have come to look upon admission to public meetings as one of their rights, who have been always encouraged in that belief by the very persons who now wanted to fight shy of them, were excited at being excluded. When we consider that the students of the Deccan College were recently invited to sign a memorial in favour of the Bill, when we know that some students were actually admitted, when we know that a general invitation was given to them some time back to form themselves into a Marriage Reform Association, we fail to see how they could be blamed for resenting exclusion from this meeting. No doubt there are many occasions when very young boys too attend meetings and create a disturbance. But this does not justify the exclusion of advanced College students. Outside it was not a gathering of students only. With them could be seen grown up persons from different communities, and wonderful to relate there were a few distinguished reformers also, who, we learn, were enjoying themselves at the expense of the mob who were being excited by the use of taunting language by the reformers we allude to above. It was impossible in such an excited and furious crowd to find out who commenced the throwing of stones, &c. But whoever did it, we cannot bring ourselves to believe that it was the boys. When it was once commenced we could understand how they might join in it half seriously, half for the fun of the thing, being encouraged by the example of older people. We cannot think that those who held the meeting did not expect this. For some time past party-feeling has been running very high here. The utterances of the reformers, their writings, their taunts and abuse have all roused very bitter feeling in the orthodox party. If you call a man a brute or an ass you will have no ground to complain if you receive brutal treatment or a few kicks from him. We are sorry that the age and position of men like Dr. Bhándárkar and Bhide were not respected. But if they went to find the real culprits, they must look nearer home. When men write with their pens dipped in venom we must be prepared for such scenes. For several days past abuse, contumely, insults and taunts unworthy to be heard from the lips of respectable persons, have been indiscriminately hurled at the devoted heads of the opponents of the Bill. We deliberately say that we were agreeably surprised to see that, notwithstanding all the fury of the mob, no actual harm was done. As a matter of fact although immediately after the rowdy proceedings rumours were afloat of several persons having received serious injuries, we made inquiries and learnt that these rumours were unfounded. This would prove that after all the crowd was not bent on serious mischief. Had it been, we think, the promoters of the meeting could scarcely have escaped scot-free. Though the aspect of affairs was threatening yet little harm to person was intended. We do not know if it is intended to take any serious steps in regard to the conduct of the mob of that day. Of course no one could object to the real offenders, when found, being punished. But all the same great discretion will have to be used. We say this as we have heard that in private conversation some of the promoters and sympathisers of Wednesday's meeting are making the most reckless charges against respectable persons who are incapable of conduct attributed to them. If the matter is to be taken into the law courts, we believe the other party will not be entirely free from liability. We hope that the elderly gentlemen of the party who have some common sense left in them will insist upon prudence and moderation. Otherwise the consequences will be disastrous. As it is matters have advanced too far. [The Kesari (44), in its issue of the 3rd March, expresses similar sentiments.]

The riotous conduct of the mob at Poona towards the supporters of the Age of Consent Bill approved of.

32. The Jagadhitechchhu (15), in its issue of the 28th February, seems to approve of the riotous conduct of the students and other people towards the supporters of the Age of Consent Bill at Poona, says that the reformers have themselves to thank for the assault committed on them by the mob, and warns them against any more attempts at disturbing the peace of the Native Society by proposals of absurd social reforms. The experience of Poona, adds the paper, ought to inform Government of the provocation and irritation caused to Hindus in general by matters concerning their women and to give an idea of the excitement which the passing of the Bill is likely to cause among the Hindu public.

Part III.—Municipalities.

Demand for a Resolution about Municipal money spent on receptions to Governors.

33. The Nagar Samáchár (51), in its issue of the 28th February, observes:—When we see the order of Mr. Loch, Collector of Dhulia, prohibiting the application of a portion of municipal funds to the reception of His Excellency the Governor during his visit to the place, and declaring such an act of the Municipality as contrary to the provisions of the Municipal Act, and note at the same time the silence observed by the Collector of Násik in a similar case, we cannot but say that a general Resolution of Government is necessary to preserve unity of procedure in all such matters in future.

Certain accusations against the Municipal Commissioners of Poona.

34. The Bráhma Patrika (144), in its issue of the 25th February, says:—Justice is dealt by the Municipality of Poona to the Bráhmins but not to other classes. There is some mismanagement in the municipal accounts. Almost all the servants of the Corporation are Bráhmins, and if a Marátha or a Mahomedan applies for employment, he is informed that there is no vacancy, while a Bráhmin is readily provided for. Persons desirous of becoming Municipal Commissioners spend sums of money between Rs. 25 and 500 each, evidently with the object of being benefited on entering the Commission.

Alleged injustice done by the Municipality of Poona to public preachers.

35. A correspondent of the Bráhma Patrika (144), in its issue of the 25th February, says that a prohibition has been issued by the Municipality of Poona against public preaching in the open ground in front of the Shanvár Váda, on the alleged ground that it causes disturbance to the market held there; however, on the same spot has a pavilion been recently erected for holding public meetings of Bráhmins and the plea of a disturbance to the market has ceased. There seems no one to ask the Corporation why it has allowed the pavilion to be erected when public preaching on the same spot has been prohibited? remarks the writer.

A request to the Municipality of Mahudha in the Kaira District to open an English School and to provide a fire-engine.

36. Svadesh Bandhu (130), in its issue of the 4th March, requests the Municipality of Mahudha, a town in the Kaira District, to open an English school as the inhabitants of that town are too poor to send their boys to Nadiád or Ahmedabad for their education. The same paper, in another place, says that much difficulty is experienced in extinguishing fires occurring in the same town on account of the absence of a fire-engine, and requests the Corporation to provide one without delay.

Part IV.—Native States.

Colonel Scott, Political Agent, Mahi Kántha, censured for not giving posts under him to the people of his district.

37. The Hitechchhu (86) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 5th March, observes:—Since his appointment in 1885 as Political Agent of Mahi Kántha, Colonel Scott has been persistently filling up vacancies occurring under him by appointing to them his own favourites who were brought from other districts in preference to really deserving people of the province under him. One of the men so appointed was Mr. Ganesh Gangádhar, Thánadár, Bávisi Zilla. He was reported so favourably by Colonel Scott that Government have been recently pleased to confer on him the personal distinction of Ráo Sáheb. While Major Ferris was Acting Political Agent, several criminal charges were preferred against the Thánadár and he has been committed to the Sessions. Mr. James, Commissioner, N. D., has also found fault with him on a careful inspection of his office, and has recorded remarks unfavourable to Colonel Scott and his Assistant. Colonel Scott has filled the temporary vacancy caused by the suspension of Mr. Ganesh Gangádhar by appointing Mr. Hiráchand Devji, who has, it is said, little knowledge of law.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ā) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

The Indian Budget and the salt-duty.

1. The Kaiser-i-Hind (87), in its issue of the 8th March, writes:—Really it is to be devoutly wished that some independent non-official member in the Viceregal Legislative Council will have the courage to criticize boldly and freely the appalling military expenditure which draws off at a swoop the entire land revenue of the country. The tax-eaters seem to be eating away the very vitals of the rayats, so to say. But unless there is a strong and indignant protest from the people's representatives in the Council,—a protest which ought to find a loud echo in every public meeting organised in the various centres of political activity—no hope of curbing the rash and headlong "policy" which so mischievously dominates the Government and renders the Finance Department powerless and helpless, can be entertained. India at this moment wants a Viceroy and Governor-General of the force of character of a Ripon and the political sagacity of a Canning to put an end to the abnormal and wasteful military activity that is allowed to run riot on the North-West frontier of the Empire. We have spent well nigh thirteen krors on special defences, which, if subjected to an independent criticism of experts like Colonels Maurice and Home, might lead to such a scandal as to rouse the indignation of the entire population. In fact, the responsible military hierarchy absorb all our growing revenues and receipts, all our new taxations, all our improvements and economies, and all our savings, as fast as they are collected. They are veritably the harpies of old,—the harpies who are sucking the very life-blood of the nation. When will India be spared from this calamitous bleeding process? We answer, again, when we have a strong-minded and righteous Viceroy of the firmness of a Ripon and of the wisdom of a Canning. In this connection it is of primary importance to remember the pledges openly given by the Government at the time the duty on salt was raised. Even then there was a deficit in opium and railway receipts amounting to 72 lákhs, besides the further loss by exchange of nearly an equal amount. But the Government declared openly and explicitly that the duty would be set back to its former rate of Rs. 2 per maund as soon as the finances were in a flourishing condition. Will the Finance Minister or any other member of the Government have the hardihood to deny the material improvement the finances of the country have undergone since 1888? The duty was submitted to because it was said to be temporary It was raised to give relief to the embarrassments which the mischievous policy of the Government itself had created. The finances have improved. Why then should Government be slow to redeem its solemn pledge? On the fulfilment of this promise will depend the confidence which Her Majesty's Indian subjects may hereafter repose in its public declarations. Government may in order to indulge in all sorts of wild trans-frontier and other warlike schemes, continue to maintain the duty at the present rate. It may put off its remission on this, that, or other plea of a similar character. It is the easiest thing in the world to maintain taxation till the end of time, and we should not be surprised if year after year some plea is put forward for the postponement of the remission. The question, however, is whether it is honest of Government to trifle so with its solemn pledge; especially, in reference to a taxation on a necessary of life like salt. What popular feeling is on this subject was well reflected in the speeches which the various speakers made at the Congress on this question. The memorial which its President was authorized to prepare and forward has been in the hands of the Finance Department for some time past, and the Government is bound to pay to it the consideration it deserves. We now hear that there is to be no discussion on the budget! This is a disagreeable surprise, if the report be true. For Lord Lansdowne gave a distinct promise last year in the open Council that he would allow members the opportunity of discussing the budget whether or not there was legislation to be introduced in its connection. Is the Viceroy going to write his words in water? We refuse to believe so, and trust the report given by a daily contemporary may prove unfounded. [The Hitechchhu (86) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 12th March, expresses similar sentiments.]

2. The Sind Sudhár (159), in its issue of the 28th February, writes:—

Distinction alleged to be observed between Natives and Europeans in several matters in spite of Proclamation of 1858.

After the mutiny of 1857, Her Majesty the Queen issued a Proclamation announcing that all Her subjects, to whatever religion and creed they may belong, would be treated equally. Such words proceeding as they did from the mouth of the Sovereign, fully assured the people that their rights would no longer be trodden under foot and that they would receive the same kind of treatment as was being accorded to the Europeans. But, in practice, the proclamation is a dead letter. The judicial law, in particular, which should not be partial to people of any caste or creed, also draws distinctions between the Natives and the Europeans. As an instance, we may mention that a European accused of having committed an offence is liable to be tried only by a European Magistrate exercising First Class powers, while a Native charged with a similar offence is triable by a Magistrate of any class. Besides, the Magistrates are invested with higher powers in respect of the Natives. If a European offender is committed to a Court of Sessions or to a District Magistrate for trial, he cannot be sentenced to more than twelve or six months' imprisonment; but in the case of Natives the Sessions Judge can pass the sentence of death. The Europeans are exempted from the sentence of transportation, while Natives are not. Many other distinctions can be pointed out. But at present, putting them aside, we beg to draw the attention of the public to a very strange rule recently passed by Government. It has been ruled that one year's furlough after 15 years' service should count towards pension provided such period be spent out of India. Now, every one will admit that the above rule is absurd and partial. Its object, apparently, is to deprive the Natives of the benefit conferred by it. If the Secretary of State had assigned any cogent reasons for passing this rule, the Natives would have had no reason to be dissatisfied. But to pass such a rule arbitrarily is against the benign policy of the British Government. It would seem that India has either committed a great sin, by reason of which a right, though admitted by the rules, is lost simply by living in it; or it would seem that because India is in the Torrid Zone and the climate of it is disagreeable to the Europeans, they have condemned it and deprived it of the above benefit. Justly speaking, it is ridiculous to compel the natives of India to spend their furlough acquired after 15 years' service in a foreign country and to induce Europeans to leave India and enjoy the breeze of their native place. The above is very unjust. We therefore beg to invite the attention of Government to this absurd rule and trust that all newspapers and public bodies will take up this question and move Government to abolish the distinction they have now made.

3. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 8th March, writes:—

The British Government compared to a Márwári.

The Márwári is known to have one vice,—intense love of money. He will stoop to anything to earn a pie. Every one is aware how interest and capital are with him very loose terms. Both of them can be so manipulated as to secure one object—the increase in the amount of the debt. "Ghee for one pice" and "one pice for the ghee" is the way in which the accounts are made up. And for these dishonourable tricks the Márwári is justly hated by those who have the misfortune to get into his clutches. Very often we hear of risings of the poor, downtrodden and ruined rayats against the Márwári money-lenders, the usual way to pay off old debts being to cut off the noses of these obnoxious people. When such outrages are committed it is not unusual to find even the greatest lovers of peace exclaiming: "They have got their due." The Márwári, however, never boasts of being humanitarian. Our Government is a Christian one and those who constitute it would resent being compared to a Márwári; but all the same, the policy of our Government in regard to money-matters is very Márwári-like, and with the vast resources of Government the said policy is much more mischievous than that of any number of Márwáris can ever be. We will now quote here a case in point. The paper here refers to a suit instituted in a Munsif's court in the district of Chittagong for the recovery of the surplus sale-proceeds of three tálukás which had been sold on the 3rd October 1877 for the recovery of arrears of Government revenue; and remarks:—No doubt the law is on the side of the Government. Technically the Government is within its rights in refusing to give up the money. But was the refusal worthy of a moral, honourable and above all a Christian Government ?

4. The Native Opinion (16), in its issue of the 8th March, writes :—The account of the defence of Bombay from the supposed night attack by a naval foe is highly interesting, and ought to let people know how wide awake is our Government about the exposed situation of our city. But in the account given there is a ludicrous or rather a mischievous incident that ought not to fail to attract the attention of the native reading public—the rising of Natives in the native town, and the despatch of Volunteers for their suppression. The loyalty of the natives of Bombay has been unquestioned and made conspicuous always by intrinsic evidence. And yet an imaginary naval attack is made the ground for our militaries to plan a scheme of operations against the natives of this city whose whole native civil population, be it remembered, is altogether disarmed, while the whole European population, both civil and military, is armed to the teeth. Moreover, while a European loafer, be he a genuine European or Eurasian, can purchase freely any number of arms or any amount of ammunition, the most highly placed Native is not allowed to purchase either arms or ammunition without the permission of the Police Commissioner. Who will not say, then, that such a position is extremely humiliating, and the assurances of our rulers about our loyalty are quite hollow ? A revolt in the native town may be as imaginary as the naval attack, but the significance of a military plan of repression is a thing which we cannot afford lightly to look at. Even a negro in England is a freeman, but a native of India with all his educational and other concomitants is not half so free !

The defence of Bombay from the supposed night attack by a naval foe, and remarks thereon.

5. The Bakul (23), in its issue of the 8th March, writes :—The decisions passed by the Settlement Officers regarding Khoti lands situated in the Ratnágiri District appear to be final, possessing the force of precedence. Against the decisions passed by the Settlement Officers some of the parties concerned filed suits in the civil court, but in one case it has been decided that the court had no power to interfere with the Settlement Officer's decision. In some cases the decision of the Settlement Officer is to the effect that the tenants of a Khoti village should pay to their Khot (landlord) a fixed portion of the produce of their fields, but it so happens that this portion is less than the assessment paid to Government in respect of those lands. The Settlement Officer's decisions are thus working a great injury to the Khots. But there seems nobody ready to do justice to the wronged landlords. The decisions passed from time to time by the Settlement Officers have created disputes among the people. It is a great pity that the decisions passed by these officers cannot be appealed against.

6. The Pratod (58), in its issue of the 9th March, says :—The Superintendent of Police of a certain district recently visited a táluka town while he was on tour, and issued a written order fining the Police Jamádár in the sum of rupees two for having failed to supply green fodder for his horse. A sheep was obtained by the same Jamádár for supplying to the same Superintendent of Police and tied up in the pound. The Collector of the district happened to visit the pound at this time, and enquired to whom did the sheep belong, and was told that it was intended for the Superintendent. The latter officer was written to by the Collector, who received a reply from the Superintendent that the animal did not belong to him. The Jamádár's deposition was taken by the Collector who fined him rupees five though he gave the true account. Under what law has the Jamádár been fined by the Superintendent of Police for failing to supply green fodder to his horse ? asks the Pratod.

Alleged unjust conduct of the Collector and the Superintendent of Police of a district not named.

7. In alluding to the acquittal of Mr. Hormasji Dorábji Daviyarválá who was tried by the Sessions Court at Thána for alleged manslaughter at Umbargaon, the Bombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 12th September, says:—At a previous enquiry started on receipt of annonymous letters the police found that the deceased died from diarrhœa, but five months after this result the police again made enquiries and this time discovered that the deceased died not from diarrhœa, but from a serious assault made on him by the accused who was accordingly proceeded against. This conduct of the police was in itself censurable, but there is still worse to follow. The witnesses produced by the police to prove the charge brought against the accused were residents not of the village to which the deceased belonged, but of a neighbouring village, and it was shown at the trial by the legal representative of the accused that these witnesses gave such conflicting evidence as led to the inference that they were tutored to give false evidence. The sentiments recorded by the Judge and the result of the trial confirm this view of the evidence of the witnesses for the prosecution, placing the conduct of the police in a bad light. This case supports the complaint frequently made about the oppression practised on poor villagers by the police and the miscarriage of justice therefrom. It is to be hoped that due enquiries will be made by Government and an improvement will be effected in the working of the police.

8. The Pratod (58), in its issue of the 9th March, attributes the increase of crime in the Sátára district to the absence of the system of roll-call of criminal classes and wandering tribes which is followed in the Dhárwár district, and requests the Superintendent of Police and the District Magistrate of Sátára to introduce the system in their district and to keep a strict watch on the criminal classes.

Increase of crime in the Sátára District and a suggestion to the district officers.

9. The Bakul (23), in its issue of the 8th March, says that a party of Beluchis has appeared at Ratnágiri like last year, and it being feared that it would go about the district to oppress the poor rayats as it did before, it is to be hoped that the district authorities will take proper steps for the protection of the rayats.

10. The Gujarát Darpan (83), in its issue of the 8th March, observes:—The printed forms for the recent census were devised with careful consideration, but it is believed that owing to ignorance and carelessness of the enumerators as well as the people, the correct ages and religious sects of the Hindus have not been noted. Since the agitation made by Mr. Malbári, Government have been desirous of knowing the ages at which marriages are generally performed among Hindus and the precise number of the higher classes among them, but this information will not be found in the census; for instance, the religious sect of Rámánandi includes Kolis and other low classes as well as the higher castes.

Remarks in connection with the recent census.

Part II.—Legislation.

11. In alluding to the telegraphic summary of the 8th instant of the report of the Select Committee on the Bill to amend the Indian Factories Act, the Jáme Jámshed (109), in its issue of the 9th March, says:—It is to be hoped that this Bill will be soon passed into a law as the selfish and designing but influential cotton manufacturers of Manchester are trying hard to incorporate in the Bill such provisions as would not fail to seriously check the rising cotton industry in India, and one cannot say that Lord Cross will not succumb to a strong pressure brought to bear on him, and consent to the wishes of selfish Manchester. The provision for observing every Sunday as a holiday except in certain cases will give satisfaction to the mill-hands as well as the mill-owners, since the Mill-owners' Association at Bombay has on its record a resolution for the closing of mills on the weekly holiday. The clause prohibiting exaction of work from women for more than eleven hours must also prove satisfactory as female labourers are not made to work in any mill for more than 10½ hours, and it is quite reasonable that work for a longer time than the proposed limit should not be exacted from them. No appreciable loss would befall the mill-proprietors from the proposed provision prohibiting employment of children under the age of fourteen except under the shift system, as child labour is so very cheap. The motion made by the Honourable Messrs. Nugent and Mackay that the views of the public on the amended Bill should be ascertained, is quite appropriate. [The Broach Samáchár (97), in its issue of the 12th March, expresses similar sentiments.]

Approval of the Select Committee's report on the Bill to amend the Indian Factories Act, except in one particular.

12. In noticing the full text of the Bill, the same newspaper, in its issue of the 12th March, says:—It is gratifying that there is every probability of the Bill being passed into a law before the close of the present month, but there is one point in the Bill that needs particular attention before the enactment of the measure. The mill-hands unanimously expressed their anxious desire that Sunday should be a close holiday. Moreover, the Mill-owners' Association had at a large meeting arrived at the resolution to observe the weekly holiday, closing the mills at an early hour on Saturday afternoon for the purpose of cleaning the machinery on the same day. To give force to this prayer of the mill-hands the Factory Commission made a similar recommendation in its able report; but the amended Bill permits the employment of mill-labourers on a Sunday for examining, cleaning or repairing machinery. Thus Sunday will not be a complete holiday and the mill-hands will be deprived of the weekly rest of which they so much stand in need. It is therefore to be hoped that the Factory Commission's recommendation will be adopted in preference to the one made by the Select Committee. Some time ought to be allowed to mill-labourers and the Mill-owners' Association to express their sentiments on the Bill as amended by the Select Committee.

13. After admitting that the short Act lately passed to amend the Criminal Procedure Code for the purpose of granting compensation to the accused in a case of frivolous and vexatious complaint, is an improvement on the Bill as introduced, the Jáme Jamshed (109), in its issue of the 11th March, says:—The amount of the compensation is restricted to Rs. 50 to each accused. This is the old limit which we consider might with advantage have been extended. For it is obvious that Rs. 50 would be no punishment to rich persons by whom this form of complaint is much affected. It is a blot also upon the Act that Magistrates of all classes have precisely the same power in this respect. A Magistrate of the Third Class can inflict a fine of not more than Rs. 50 for offences which he may try and he may also grant compensation of Rs. 50 to an accused person. In the same way a Second Class Magistrate may fine up to Rs. 200 and a First Class Magistrate up to Rs. 1,000, but these higher officers cannot award a higher compensation than Rs. 50. In the case of the Third Class Magistrate his power to award compensation is equal to his power of fine. But in the case of the First Class Magistrate his power to grant compensation is only one-twentieth of the powers of fine. Clearly there is room for improvement here. Either the power of the Third Class Magistrate is too high, or the power of the First Class Magistrate is too low. Considering the circumstances and surroundings under which Subordinate Magistrates exercise their powers, we consider it would have been advisable to restrict their power of granting compensations to a much smaller sum than Rs. 50. It is true that their orders may be appealed against, but appeals in the rural districts are rare and the right of appeal is not a sufficient safeguard against an abuse of this power.

Remarks on the new Act for granting compensation to the accused in a case of frivolous and vexatious complaint.

14. In noticing the report of the Select Committee on the Age of Consent Bill, the Jáme Jamshed (109), in its issue of the 9th March, says:—The recommendations made by the Select Committee remove to a certain extent the harshness of the original Bill, but it would be more satisfactory to the Hindu community were the suggestions made the other day by the Hindu supporters of the Bill at Bombay at their meeting at Javer Bág. At this meeting it was suggested, with the unanimous consent of the people assembled, that in the case of an outrage committed on a girl below the age of 12 by her husband, the former or her nearest relative or her guardian alone ought to be the persons on whose complaint the case should be taken up, and the sentence of ten years provided in the Bill for the offending husband being over-harsh it should be altered to imprisonment for a year or six months. These suggestions were moderate and their adoption would not have in any way miscarried the intentions of the Bill.

15. The Gujarát Darpan (83), in its issue of the 12th March, writes:—We do not think people will be quite satisfied with the alterations suggested by the Select Committee on the Scoble Bill. In the first place, they do not go far enough to disarm all opposition, and, in the second place, the evil of police interference they provide against will have only an indirect check, quite depending on the personnél of the magistracy and police. They recommend that only Magistrates of the highest class should be permitted to take cognizance of the offence of rape committed by a husband on his girl-wife, and that when a police investigation is deemed necessary, such investigation should be made by an officer of a superior rank. These amendments do not make such a compromise as would conciliate the party opposed to the Bill. We admit that the alterations are suggested in the hope of the Bill proving acceptable to the people and at the same time they would fulfil their purpose to a small degree. But instead of driving the bargain harder than necessary, the Legislature would do well to win over that part of the orthodox party that opposes the Bill only on the ground of vexatious interference, severity of punishment and such other reasons. One cannot contradict the fact, so prominently brought out, that at least in point of numbers the opposition party has a superiority. We have not to consider how that numerical superiority is formed, whether by jealousy of Government interference, or by misguiding opinions about the relation of the rulers and the ruled, or otherwise. Similarly, it should be no concern of ours to say that the Bill does not affect some of the opponents who swell the numbers. It would be a wise policy in such matters as this for Government to leaven the principle of everything for the people by that of everything by the people. Going on both these principles the Government would be inevitably led to accept a far-going compromise such as was adopted at the meeting at Javer Bág in Bombay. In spite of the Select Committee, no one would believe that the offence of a husband as against his wife—call it rape or by any other name—is of so serious a nature as that committed by a stranger against her. The gravity of rape consists in the social degradation and the life-long shame which the outraged female is subjected to. This is wanting when the husband is the offender. Hence it would be an anomaly to sentence him to so rigorous a punishment as transportation. Since all educated opinion has verged towards making a distinction between the husband and a stranger, an amendment should be brought forward in the Council, proposing to consider the offence of the husband a misdemeanour and not a felony. Other amendments that have been suggested have, we fear, no chance of acceptance in the Council, though the one about the right of complaint would disarm all opposition and would bring a reconciliation of opinion all over the country.

16. The Kesari (44), in its issue of the 10th March, says :—The report of the Select Committee on the Age of Consent Bill seems to have given some encouragement to the supporters of the Bill, but if no effect is produced by the extensive opposition elicited by the measure, it will have to be recorded that their principles of government have been ignored by the British rulers. The Select Committee's report deserves little weight as even the suggestions made by the supporters of the Bill have not been duly considered in it. It is to be hoped that important recommendations and suggestions anent the Bill will be placed before the Council at the coming discussion of the measure.

Select Committee's report on the Age of Consent Bill considered unsatisfactory.

17. The Native Opinion (16), in its issue of the 8th March, quotes the telegraphic summary published in the Bombay Gazette of the report of the Select Committee on the Age of Consent Bill, and observes :—If the above be the whole substance of the Committee's report, then we may say that the Bill has not undergone any material change. Indeed, the entertainment and trial of a case by the Chief Magistrate of a district is an improvement; but, for the hot haste with which the Bill will be carried through the Council neither the majority of the supporters of the Bill nor its opponents will thank our rulers. The latter ought to know that to the Bill are attached two other evils—one immediate and the other prospective—which cannot but render the life of every Hindu family miserable in the end. To prove the exact age of a girl registry offices will become necessary and they must come in with their attendant evils, and when the age-limit may still further be pushed on, divorce must also come in that will sap the very basis of our social happiness.

The same paper, in its issue of the 12th March, observes that the Select Committee's report on the Bill is evidently drawn up without considering the extensive opposition called forth by the measure, and hopes that due regard will be paid to public opinion at the next discussion on the Bill.

18. The Rájyabhaktá (120), in its issue of the 10th March, observes:—The report that the Government of India are determined to pass the Age of Consent Bill in spite of the strong opposition from the orthodox public has caused wide-spread discontent among the people. If Government turn a deaf ear to the numerous protests made against the Bill in a constitutional manner, the people would have recourse to unconstitutional means to gain their object as they did on former occasions. If the Bill is passed in its present form people will devise various means to evade the law. We recommend the opponents of the Bill not to take any rash step in the matter and to appeal to Parliament if the Bill is passed into a law. The Gujaráti (84), in its issue of 8th March, says:—The report of the Select Committee on the Age of Consent Bill shows that Government have paid no attention to the suggestions made by the supporters of the Bill and want to pass the measure without making further changes. The Satyavakta (123), in its issue of the 13th March, considers the changes proposed by the Select Committee to be quite insufficient, and observes that no Hindu will give any information to a Police officer in such matters about his female relatives.

19. In a communicated article the Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 8th March, writes:—The unlooked for harsh operation of the Salt Act points a moral which those who have been goading the Supreme Legislature to pass the Age of Consent Bill may well lay to their hearts which they profess to be over-flowing with the milk of human kindness. The Salt Act of 1890 was on the Legislative anvil for more than three months at any rate; it was discussed and criticised from all points of view almost threadbare both in the Legislative Council and the public press. Moreover, people did so with perfectly cool heads; and still such an anomaly escaped the lynx-eyed sight of so many watchful dogs. And still there are people, the most enlightened and the most humane as they ask to call them, who are moving heaven and earth to pass the present Bill almost in indecent haste though it touches the weal and woe of the tenderest kind of millions of people, without allowing breathing time to see whether it is capable of more improvement still, when according to the admissions in black and white of these social reform monopolists themselves, it has been shown to be not infallible. It passes our understanding that simply to suit the personal conveniences of the Honourable Mover or, more questionable still, to gratify the personal vanity of one individual in the shortest time possible, the responsible Legislature should hurry the measure through its second and third readings within the next few days. We are afraid the enthusiastic supporters of this suggestion have one more sad disappointment in store for them, but like others it is of their own making.

The haste with which the Age of Consent Bill is being pushed through the Viceregal Council condemned.

20. The Káthiáwár Times (3), in its issue of the 7th March, writes:—The article in the London Spectator against the Age of Consent Bill deserves to be carefully read and thought over by those who favour the passing of the Bill. The writer takes a more sensible view of the question than is to be found in the stupid vapourings of the Disapproval of the Age of Consent Bill as it is, and several amendments recommended.

Times and other journals. Even those who favour the passing of the Bill do not approve it as a whole. They suggest modifications. Unqualified approval has not come from a single quarter. Public opinion is absolutely unanimous, and it is to the effect that the Bill, as it is, is open to various objections. The suggestions that a husband's offence should in no case be rape, that the age of puberty should be the age of consent, that complaint against a man for so-called rape on his wife should not be entertained unless made by the wife herself or by her guardians,— all deserve careful consideration before the Bill is passed. That it will be an engine of oppression is clear to everybody. It is stupid Legislation which enacts a law which proves either a dead letter or an engine of oppression. It is absurd—and none but fools so argue—to assert that the Legislature is bound to pass the Bill to maintain its own prestige. Prestige can never be maintained by doing wrong. By passing the Bill Government is more likely to lose its prestige. Some people, especially the Anglo-Indians, argue that because the Government has abolished Sati, infanticide, and what not, it must pass the Bill. This view of theirs is unsound. The Mahomedans are not indifferent as the Spectator is led to believe. They vehemently protest against the Bill; and to ignore their protests is to pave the way for a flat rebellion.

21. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 11th March, writes :—Though this Bill has led to a very serious division of opinion among the Bengális, the Maráthás, the Gujráthis, and the Mussalmans, the general concensus of opinion throughout the country is that it should not be passed without providing adequate safeguards. Among those who hold this opinion there are hundreds who are keenly alive to the evils of child-marriage and to its mischievous effects upon the life of the nation. All are anxious for a reform, but all are anxious at the same time that no mischief should arise from the Bill when it is enforced. All say in short: "We support the Bill, but knowing the possibilities of abuse to which the new law may be liable, we insist upon adequate precautions being taken." Nawáb Bahádur Abdul Lateef Khan, in a communication to Government, says that the Bill is objectionable to the Mahomedans because if a woman is divorced without the marriage being consummated she cannot get the full amount of her dower, nor would she be entitled to maintenance until consummation has taken place. It is also believed that the Bill, if passed, might give rise to vexatious and unjustifiable annoyance to respectable families. We appeal to Government once more either to drop the Bill at once or to postpone it until it is well thought over. Already the Bill has awakened wide-spread alarm, and the people fear that the passing of it is a prelude to a policy of interference with their domestic concerns.

The reformer's prayer for Government interference in social matters and its probable results.

22. In a communicated article the Karnátak Patrá (138), in its issue of the 9th March, writes :—The reformers have received an English education, and have been metamorphosed, so to say, by its influence. They are no longer natives in the true sense of the word. In their eagerness to get into the confidence of the authorities and to gain a name for themselves, the reformers, it seems to me, have lost their heads. They are not conscious of the mistake they are making in exposing their own weakness. These men are proclaiming by their own actions that they are such a useless lot that they cannot themselves manage their own household affairs. They are letting others understand that they are so helpless creatures as not to be able to protect their daughters from their sons-in-law or their daughters-in-law from their own sons, and therefore pray Government to keep a watch in the private rooms of their homes. What will the enemies of the Congress say now? Will they not say in the language of the Bible that "these men have come forward to save others, themselves they cannot save." Men quite incapable of governing their own homes want to govern the country! Our so-called reformers, by betraying their own weakness, have done a great injury to the cause of the Congress. The orthodox Hindus are not, as a class, opposed to the reform which the reformed party wants to force on their community. What they view with alarm and object to, is Government interference in their religious duties and social customs. The Hindus prize above all, even above their own lives, the sanctity of their homes and the purity of their females. To a Hindu there cannot be anything more disastrous and humiliating than an exposure of his female relatives before a court of justice. When the Bill becomes law, a young girl will be dragged before the court to give evidence against her husband for his having outraged her, and the questions that will be put to her by the Magistrate and pleaders will, as a matter of course, be very filthy. What a Hindu father will then feel, can be well imagined by the orthodox Hindus, and not by the reformers whose heads have been turned by their English education and western civilization. When a Hindu father hears that the person of his daughter has been subjected to a medical examination he and his daughter will surely commit suicide. When a Hindu girl hears that her husband has been transported for life she will as certainly put an end to her existence. A little deliberation will show that the proposed measure will be a curse to the country. Europeans cannot realize the feelings of the Hindus and we do not blame them for it. Their object is to do good, but they commit the mistake of judging the proposed measure from their own point of view.

Reformers and the Age of Consent Bill.

23. The Poona Vaibhav (55), in its issue of the 8th March, says :—We are surprised to see the reformers are asking Government to legislate in a social matter when the same is sure to prove an oppression on the people. The so-called reformers should first practise what they preach, so that others may willingly join them when they see good results have accrued from these reforms. Government should not pass the Age of Consent Bill, which is partially supported by about two hundred reformers, dissatisfying thereby the millions who are opposed to the measure. A law for the benefit of the reformers alone may be enacted; but it is almost certain that in such a contingency they would renounce their principles of reform.

24. The Bombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 11th March, says :—Up to date three meetings have been held by the Mahomedans of Bombay in connection with the Age of Consent Bill, two in support of and one against the proposed measure. The supporters of the Bill had invited their opponents to discuss the subject, while to the single meeting held by the opponents at the Juma Masjid those conforming to their views were alone invited. At this latter meeting about one thousand persons were present, among whom were not to be seen any of the leaders or educated men of the community. This fact shows that the majority of the Mahomedans neither support nor oppose the Bill, and are quite unconcerned. The opponents seem to make a stand simply on account of their ignorance of the measure, which if it was really opposed to their religion would have been more strenuously protested against than at present. At the special meeting of the Anjuman-i-Islam, held last Sunday under the presidentship of Mr. Badrudin Tyebji, the opposition could not quote the Koran or other high religious authority and had resort to later works and legends. Khán Bahádur Ghulám Mahomed Munshi asserted that the Prophet Mahomed married Bibi Ayesha when she was six years old and had intercourse with her when she was nine. This statement was, however, contradicted by Mr. Abdulla Meherali Dharamsi at a previous meeting of the Mahomedans, and hence carries no weight. The other statement made by the opposition was to the effect that the Mahomedan religion sanctioned intercourse with a girl who had commenced the monthly course, provided she was healthy. Unfortunately, the opponents of the Bill ignore the important condition attached to the sanction. No other objection to the Bill was advanced at the meetings, showing thereby that none exist.

A meeting of the Mahomedans of Bombay against the Age of Consent Bill.

25. The Kaside Mumbai (112), in its issue of the 9th March, says :—The Committee appointed at the meeting held on the 25th February at the request of the Anjumane Vyáz Islam, recently convened a private meeting of the leading members of the community and several Moulvis, Kazees and Patels to adopt the memorial against the Age of Consent Bill prepared by the Committee. The memorial was unanimously adopted and signed by those present, and further signatures were collected on Friday last, at a meeting of the Mahomedans of different sects, in the Juma Masjid, when about 3,000 persons were present.

26. The Kaeide Mumbai (112), in its issues of the 9th and 11th March, gives an account of the proceedings of a meeting of Mahomedans convened at Bombay by the Anjuman-i-Islam on the 8th instant, to consider the Age of Consent Bill, and says:—It was an informal meeting, not being in accordance with the rules of the Anjuman-i-Islam, and the President overruled this objection when it was urged. One of the speakers, Mr. Meherali Dharamsi, a Khoja by caste, spoke something on religion, but he seemed to know very little of the subject. The Mahomedan community would do well to strictly observe their religious precepts and not to imitate Europeans.

A meeting of the Mahomedans held by the Anjuman-i-Islam of Bombay to support the Age of Consent Bill and another meeting protesting against the Bill.

27. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 13th March, states:—A counter meeting of the Mahomedans was held on the 11th instant, under the presidency of Kazee Mahumad Ali Murge, showing that the Bill numbers in its supporters amongst the Mahomedans only a few Khojás and Sulemáni Voras who have not much respect for Islámism. The Bombay Samáchár is misguided in supposing that Messrs. Badrudin, Fázalbhái and a few other educated gentlemen who were promoters of the meeting held on the 8th instant are the only leading Mahomedans. We challenge these gentlemen to contradict the Moulvis, Kazees and others who have protested against the Bill on religious grounds.

28. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 8th March, writes:—We learn from a correspondent at Sholápur that during the past week two meetings were held there, one in favour of and the other against the Age of Consent Bill. The first meeting was held in the High School. It is represented in the telegrams to the daily papers as "influential." It may be so; but it must be borne in mind that such meetings are always said to be so. But we learn that people were admitted indiscriminately, that when a show of hands was called for, 45 were raised against and 35 in favour of the Bill, but that the proposition to send a memorial in favour of the Bill was declared to be carried on the ground that the meeting was of those who were in favour and that the other party therefore had no locus standi there. If that was so, it was a pity the others were admitted. The other meeting was held in an open square. It was attended by more than two thousand people. The Hindu Shástri and the Mahomedan Kázi sat side by side. We do not know whether we may call this meeting an "influential" and successful one. At first it was intended to be held in the High School, but permission to do so was refused on the ground that the available space there would not suffice.

Meetings for and against the Age of Consent Bill at Sholápur.

29. A correspondent of the Kesari (44), in its issue of the 10th March, says:—On Monday last, a meeting under the presidentship of Mr. S. N. Tagore was held at Sholápur in support of the Age of Consent Bill. One of the signatures on the invitation card for this meeting was that of Dr. Kirloskar, L.M. & S., without whose consent his name was affixed to the invitation. The opponents of the Bill requested a discussion on the subject before declaration for or against the Bill, but their request was not attended to. On a request from the President 31 persons voted for the Bill and 47 declared against it; but the President announced on flimsy grounds that the measure had the support of the majority of the meeting, which was evidently formed of the Subordinate Judge, the vakils, the clerks of the Civil Court, school-masters and some school boys. A counter-meeting was held subsequently at which about five thousand persons were present and among them were learned Hindu and Mahomedan gentlemen. Ráo Sáheb Malláppa Varad presided at this meeting, and the public were requested to join the discussion, but nobody came forward in support of the measure. Resolutions protesting against the Bill and for appealing to the Home Government if the Bill was passed into a law, were passed at this meeting. The memorial to the Government of India opposing the Bill is signed by upwards of seven thousand persons, while that in support of the measure mentioned above bears scarcely forty-five signatures.

30. The Phœnix (5), in its issue of the 4th March, writes:—Mr. Justice Telang's open and persistent advocacy of the new Bill has made a Calcutta critic ask the question whether it is not an infringement of the orders of the Government of India which have just attracted so much attention. The sarcasm which amplifies the question is not of public interest, but the question certainly is. The orders of the Government have just been clearly explained by the direct authority of the Viceroy, and the question is whether those orders have been disregarded by the Bombay Judge. There are standing orders that Government servants should not write to the press, but this merely applies to departmental matters and not to questions of general interest. As to legislative measures on the anvil high officials have generally an opportunity of expressing an opinion, because they are generally consulted. It may be even permissible for them to submit their opinions through the usual channel without waiting to be consulted. But when Government are initiating a legislative measure, can a Government servant be permitted to influence public opinion by his open advocacy or opposition? Mr. Justice Telang's is a special case which his Calcutta critic does not care to distinguish. It is not merely as a Judge of the High Court that he is supporting the measure. He was a Judge when he presided over the Bombay Social Conference. He is justified in thinking that the Bill has been introduced, partly at any rate, in consequence of the memorial that he as President of the Conference signed in 1889. He is therefore pledged to support the measure. He did not speak at the Javer Bág meeting, although the audience must have been anxious to hear him. But he has written largely in the public press in support of the Bill. Sir Andrew Scoble must have been glad of such efficient service. But what if Mr. Telang had been opposed to the measure? Such a contingency is not impossible. A man like Mr. Telang is valuable as a helper, but he is formidable as an opponent. What if he had inundated the newspapers with notes and letters and leaders against the Bill and joined hands with Mr. Telang, (? Tilak) and ex-Professor Jinsiwále? There are Indian High Court Judges in Calcutta and Madras. They have maintained discreet silence, but they could, if they chose, place the Government in an embarrassing position by identifying themselves with popular agitation. This is a danger which must be realized, however much we may appreciate the service that Mr. Telang has been able to render to a good cause. If Government servants, officials of high position, are free to advocate a legislative measure they should be equally free to condemn it, and it is for the Government to decide whether such liberty should be given. For ourselves we can only say that if the Government gives absolute independence to its servants in the free expression of individual opinion, it will have no reason to regret its enlightened highmindedness.

31. In a communicated article, the Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 8th March, writes:—The alleged misbehaviour of the student-world of your city before the Krida Bhuwan on Wednesday week has provoked the ire of many an indignant journalist, and rightly so. If the students of Poona have behaved in an insolent and disrespectful manner, which they are asserted to have done, it is certainly disgraceful to them and they deserve all the condemnation that has been meted out to them in the public press and private circles. But having said so much, we may take leave to ask whether they alone are to be the exclusive recipients of all this approbrium. We may be allowed to ask whether some of these indignant journalists, who have poured the vials of their wrath on the devoted heads of these students, are not themselves guilty of even a wider breach of decorum than the misguided students. As possessed or rather supposed to be possessed of greater discretion, and as one who have certainly passed many more winters, they are, perhaps, exposed to severer criticism than these young chaps. What right have they, we ask, to join the chorus of disapproval and the cry 'shame.' Is it that as soon as one enters the edidor's room with pen in hand, he is absolved from all the restraints of politeness and due respect for the feelings of others? But generally on all such occasions it is taken for granted that it is one party alone that deserves all the blame, while the other or others are above all suspicion like Cæsar's wife. It will be the veriest anomaly in the laws and principles of sociology if the teachers, the parents, and the self-made exponents and moulders of public opinion should be all goody-goody, and youngsters alone, who are, above all, imitative, should grow disobedient and discourteous though brought up amidst such perfectly healthy surroundings. We shall have to considerably modify our present views of the relations between cause and effect, between objects and their environments, and so on, before we can bring ourselves to believe such manifest incongruities. Rowdyism in street implies as its necessary correlative rowdyism at school, rowdyism at home, and rowdyism at the editor's table. That the last should for the moment put on the lion's skin and begin to growl in pious indignation reminds one of the similar feat often indulged in by the rabid type of Anglo-Indian journalism of picking holes in the coat of the Native Press and of reading long sermons on moderation, respect for truth, &c., &c. Physician, heal thyself!

32. The Kaiser-i-Hind (87), in its issue of the 8th March, writes:—It is in the fitness of things that side by side with an improved Factory Act which shall better protect the life and limbs of factory-hands and secure them more favourable conditions of work, there should be an improved Boiler Inspection Act which shall reduce to the irreducible minimum the possible dangers attendant on employing steam in the growing factories of all kinds and degrees in our Presidency. Under the circumstances, it is quite intelligible to understand the enlightened motives which have prompted the Local Government to supersede the existing Boilers Inspection Act by a brand new piece of legislation everyway more suitable and wholesome to the manufacturing circumstances prevailing in the province. The Honourable Mover of the Bill explained the object and reasons of his latest legislative handiwork with his usual lucidity. The speech in which he referred to the alterations in the existing law was thoroughly practical, and altogether free from that scholastic or pedantic conceit which oftener than not characterises his essays in legislation. In fact, it is the only speech in which he has refrained from attitudinising as the practical philosopher and legislator combined. On the whole, the improvements and alterations proposed seem to have met the approval of our local legislators; though, of course, some practical details, which the practical steamuser alone can deal with comprehensively, would still require a thorough discussion. After approving of the objections brought to the notice of the Council by the Honourable Mr. Wádia, the paper continues:—It is to be hoped that the Examining Board will be of a thoroughly representative and independent character and of persons well qualified to examine candidates for working land engines and boilers. We do not see why Mr. Wádia himself ought not to be one of the examiners. Surely with an annually increasing number of Native candidates going up for the examination, a Native engineer of his experience would not be undesirable. As to certificates of service, it is to be hoped the Select Committee will carefully consider the point. These are certain to be fruitful of scandals, if granted indiscriminately or on the principle of favouritism. Hard and fast rules should certainly be adopted with the view that the good object they are intended to carry out may not be defeated. In fact, it is the toughest part of the Bill round which the toughest fight may ensue in the meetings of the Select Committee and of the Council. Hence every care and caution should be taken to frame the provisions regarding the granting of the certificates. Here the healthy criticism of non-official members like Messrs. Forrest and Javerilál might prove of the greatest service. The Committee of the Mill-owners' Association, too, should be consulted on the point.

PART III.—Education.

Remarks on the alleged compulsory retirement of Ráo Bahádur Gopálji Surbhái, Assistant Educational Inspector, Káthiáwár.

33. The Prajámat (119), in its issue of the 7th March, is surprised to hear that Ráo Bahádur Gopálji Surbhái, Assistant Educational Inspector, Káthiáwár, is to be made to retire on pension though he is able enough to do his work, while Ráo Sáheb Mahipatrám Ruprám, Principal, Training College, Ahmedabad, has been granted several extensions notwithstanding the fact that he has become old and his sight is affected and is therefore unable to discharge his duties properly.

Some mistakes in Dr. Bhándárkar's Second Book of Sanskrit.

34. A correspondent writing to the Jagadhitechchhu (15), in its issue of the 7th March, points out three Sanskrit sentences in Dr. Bhándárkar's Second Book of Sanskrit as instances of grammatical impropriety, says that the book abounds in many more instances offending the rules of grammar, and wonders how these errors have escaped the notice of the learned doctor.

Part IV.—Municipalities.

Ráo Sáheb Námjoshi on the charges preferred against the Poona Municipality.

35. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 8th March, publishes the fourth and last letter of Ráo Sáheb Námjoshi in refutation of the charges preferred against the City Municipality of Poona, which concludes thus:—"If my letters have only convinced your readers that there is another side to the question and that too not quite a weak one, I have done my duty towards the Municipality, and my constituents will pardon me if I request them to excuse me from serving them. I have learnt with extreme regret that the Corporation is condemned not because its work is bad but because it has a few members on it who, owing to their spirit of independence, are no friends of the officials. I would, as my last prayer to Government, say, please do not condemn a Corporation because a few of your officials happen to be prejudiced against a few individual members. The rate-payers know whom to elect and whom to throw away, and an intelligent city like Poona would never give power or place to one who it knows would make a bad use of what he has won."

Part V.—Native States.

Remarks on the reply of the Under Secretary of State for India to a question on the Cambay disturbances asked in Parliament.

36. With reference to the reply given by Sir John Gorst, the Under Secretary of State for India, to a question put by Mr. Burt in connection with the disturbances which occurred at Cambay on 19th September last, the Bombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 12th March, says:—The reply is unsatisfactory. The enquiries made and the measures taken in connection with the disturbance by the Bombay Government were altogether unsatisfactory to the native public who are sorry for the same and for the Cambay rayats not getting complete justice. The Bombay Committee for obtaining redress to the people of Cambay ought to impress on the mind of a well-wisher of India in Parliament the impropriety of appointing Mr. Cooke as a Judge to try the persons accused of having created the disturbance though it was he who ordered an armed attack to be made on the rioters, the injustice done to the rioters by the refusal of the Judge to admit as evidence some important matters favourable to the accused, and the non-acceptance by the Bombay Government of the fresh information collected by the Bombay Committee in connection with the riot. Much good is certain to follow from this proceeding. [The Jáme Jamshed (109), in its issue of the same date expresses similar sentiments].

Colonel Scott, Political Agent, Mahi Kántha, praised for introducing certain reforms in his district.

37. The Swadesh Bandhu (130), in its issue of the 11th March, observes:—Many reforms have been introduced in the Mahi Kántha Agency during the incumbency of Colonel Scott as Political Agent, and that he has always appointed deserving men under him. One of our contemporaries has recently found fault with him for the appointment of Ráo Sáheb Ganeshpant Gangádhar; but the latter gentleman is an able officer and has been highly spoken of by several high officials besides Colonel Scott. Major Ferris, on the other hand, is said to have been not careful about filling vacancies in his gift; for instance, Mr. Chhotálál Parshotam has been appointed as Katosan Thánadár who is said to be wanting in requisite qualifications for the post.

Public nuisance at Shahápur in the Southern Marátha Country.

38. A correspondent writing to the Vijaya (75), of the 6th March, requests the attention of the Political Agent, Southern Marátha Country, to the public nuisance at Shaháput caused by the waste water of a distillery and a tannery, situated within the local limits of Belgaum, being allowed to flow upon land within the local limits of the former town whose health, it is stated, has been thereby injured, and prays that officer to ask the Collector of Belgaum to put a stop to the nuisance.

39. A correspondent of the Rájyabhakta (120), in its issue of the 10th March, observes that it is reported that the Police authorities of Porbandar while inquiring into the theft committed at the village of Bhárwáda in that State tortured about seven accused persons so severely that one of them is said to be in a precarious condition. It is also said that in another case of theft a widow was stripped naked and insulted by the Police of the same State. Ráo Bahádur S. P. Pandit, the Administrator, is requested to inquire into these reports, and if they are substantiated, to duly punish the offenders.

Complaints against the Police authorities of the Porbandar State.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ā) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

1. The Kaiser-i-Hind (86), in its issue of the 15th March, writes:—

Selection of Mr. Bryce, M.P., as "member for India," approved.

The British Committee of the Indian National Congress has displayed admirable judgment in selecting Mr. Bryce, the well-known historian and scholar, to take charge of Mr. Bradlaugh's India Councils Bill. A better selection could not have been made at this juncture. India wanted a man of his authority and of his knowledge of Indian opinion and Indian sentiments, Indian wants and Indian wishes, to impress on the House of Commons the desirability of that reasonable and moderate reform of our Legislative Councils which the Congress annually presses for. To his extensive scholarship Mr. Bryce adds the breadth of view of the philosophic statesman who has made the constitutions of great States the study of a life-time and a ripe judgment strengthened by the knowledge derived from a personal visit to India three years ago. Committed to no interests but those of fair-play and fully impartial, the enlistment of such a personality as that of Mr. Bryce at this juncture is indeed fortunate. India may well rely upon him for the advocacy of her claim to elective Legislative Councils. In a sense we shall now less feel the irreparable loss of Mr. Bradlaugh. Sir William Wedderburn, Mr. Yule, Mr. Caine and Mr. Digby are entitled to our highest gratitude for the care and forethought with which they set themselves to the task of finding a desirable member to take charge of the Bill. [The Gujaráti (83) in its issue of the same date expresses similar sentiments.]

2. The Jáme Jamshed (107), in its issue of the 17th March, regrets that the Regret expressed for non-submission of the Financial Statement to the Imperial Legislative Council for discussion.

Financial Statement is not to be placed this year before the Imperial Legislative Council for discussion, and observes that there was no objection to the Budget being brought before the Council if His Excellency wished to do so, and that if it were discussed the glaring facts that the enhancement of 1888 in the salt duties has been unjustly maintained and that the increased allotments from the sums allowed for the expenses of the minor administrations have been unjustifiably appropriated by the Supreme Government, would be brought to the notice of Government by the non-official Members of the Council.

3. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 15th March, writes:—In about a week more the annual Financial Statement will be published. This year again the Government, it is believed, will have a surplus to dispose of. How will they utilize it? Will they reduce the salt-tax? That is the question on every one's lips just now. The Sárvajanik Sabha has submitted to Government a well-reasoned and strong representation on the subject. At various places in the Presidency meetings have been held to represent that the recent increase in the tax should be reduced as promised by the Secretary of State and the Viceroy who made the increase. But rumours and hints have been thrown out through officially inspired journals pointing out the helpless condition of the Finance Minister in regard to a reduction of taxation, thus preparing people for another disappointment. We, however, regret that the agitation in regard to this question should not have been so strong and sustained as it ought to have been. And for this we have to thank the Age of Consent Bill. Everywhere the small band of political leaders has been split into two irreconcilable parties. From present appearances at least they appear to be irreconcilable, and we shall be glad to find these appearances deceitful. The legislationists have been proclaiming from the house-tops that the opponents of the Age of Consent Bill are men of no weight, little education and but a small modicum of good sense. They probably feel that they cannot now conscientiously ask these people to meet together and join in a protest against the increase in the salt-tax. If they were to do it themselves Government would say that they are a microscopic minority, more microscopic than on the Age of Consent question as the officials who have at present helped to swell their numbers would not, and could not even if they would, join them in a representation against the salt-tax. They are barred by the service rules from taking any part in a political movement! This is the pass to which matters have been brought by the ill-starred Bill and the attitude of those of us who have been supporting it through thick and thin.

Remarks on the reply of the Government of India to the memorial from the Indian National Congress for a reduction of the salt-tax.

4. The Jáme Jamshed (107), in its issue of the 20th March, says:—The Indian National Congress had memorialized the Government of India to reduce the salt-tax to its previous rate of two rupees per maund, supporting its memorial with certain reasons. The Government of India have replied in terms which preclude all hope of a reduction in the tax in the ensuing year. This is a brief summary of the official correspondence on the subject. The impression which the reply of the Financial Secretary conveys is that the Indian Congress is not to be held in high esteem by the Government of India. There is an abruptness of expression amounting to impatience in the whole of paragraphs 2, 3 and 4 of the reply which seems to say, "Be pleased to mind your own business and do not pretend to teach the Government its financial duties." After commenting on the individual paragraphs to the same effect, the Jáme continues:—Having picked these small holes in the memorial the Government of India has shaken itself free of the Congress and its petition to reduce the salt-tax. We may allow the memorialists to defend their own statements, and think they may be successfully defended. If the Government of India wish to retain hold of the maximum salt revenue which it now draws with much hardship to the people,—and there can be no doubt that they wish to retain this hold,—financial excuses will not be wanting for retaining the bone which it holds so lightly between its teeth. We fear the Congress will find itself unable to convince the Government against its will. But the Congress has done one good service by its memorial. It has elicited definite information that there will be no reduction of taxation in the coming official year. This information was previously discounted by the press when the demi-official announcement was made that the Budget would not be discussed. The truth is the Government of India are pressed with official necessities. The Civil Service, in which we include everything that is not military, is increasing by leaps and bounds, and the Military necessities are perceived to be endless. "Efficient defence" is the cry of the hour. This is a wonderfully broad expression. If it were possible to devote 50 per cent. of the gross revenues of India to defence, it would be found that the other 50 per cent. was required for the purpose of covering the magical word "adequate." Under these two heads of "Civil" and "Military" expenditure all the natural elasticity of the Indian budgets is capable of being exhausted. There is nothing left for the improvement of the country. It is the "Empire" that is being improved apart from the people, for the people have no part in the Empire except as tax-payers. The Congress memorial has failed, and so also has the well drawn memorial of the Sárvajanik Sabha. But we commend both to the Congress and the Sabha to pursue the subject of the salt-tax to its legitimate conclusion. The arguments to be used against the present enhanced tax should be drawn from financial and sanitary evidence; and these arguments, if pushed home, will be found convincing even to Financial Secretaries. Every Indian statesman who has spoken on the subject, as well as every financier, have expressed the opinion that the maximum salt-tax should be held in reserve for great and unforeseen emergencies, because it is the only tax which possesses an elasticity suitable to such an emergency. Evidence abounds in support of this opinion. When the Government of India raised the tax to its present limit they felt they were departing from a wise financial principle. But having broken through the principle they are in a suitable frame of mind to forget all about it. This principle of finance should be forced upon public attention, for the European mind cannot adequately grasp the full meaning of a maximum salt-tax. There is nothing in England to correspond with it. The excise revenue in England might be raised 100 per cent. by a stroke, and though such a fiscal measure might overthrow a Government the country would be none the worse for it. It is very different with a salt-tax which is a tax on a necessary of life and contributed mainly by persons who live from hand to mouth and by some who are compelled to live only on half a mouthful. If the Congress and the Sabha would search for evidence bearing on the oppression which is caused by the enhanced tax on the salt we are certain they would find evidence which never reaches either a blue-book or an administration report. If the Congress possesses its centres and its sub-committees, these centres and sub-committees should be asked to furnish replies to well-considered questions. They would then be supplied with a budget of evidence which could be concentrated in a complete report. This is called in Europe "collective investigation." Government make use of this system to some extent. And so should the Congress. We should then get at the truth of the matter from a social and sanitary point of view. These are just the parts of the subject in which Government are deficient. The evidence of a private collective investigation would enable the collectors to avoid all errors, to clear up all doubts, and to clench their conclusions. Even a Finance Minister when full of fun would hesitate to poke fun at such a collection of facts. [The Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 19th March, expresses somewhat similar sentiments.]

Lord Cross's Bill about leave to certain high officials in India to visit England on official work, approved.

5. The Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 19th March, approves of Lord Cross's Bill enabling certain high officials in India to go home on leave of absence without forfeiting their appointments or pay, recently passed by the House of Lords, observing that the proposed law after it has finally passed the House of Commons, would prove of great use on a political emergency arising either in Asia or Europe, and expresses a hope that the measure will be confined to its legitimate purpose without a variation prejudicial to the interests of the Indian administration.

The recent order of the Secretary of State for India regarding the study of Oriental languages by Military officers, disapproved.

6. The Jáme Jamshed (107), in its issue of the 16th March, says :—It is very surprising that the Secretary of State for India should have removed the restriction regarding actual residence in India in the case of Military officers studying Oriental languages and competing for rewards of Degrees of Honour in Hindi, Bengáli, Persian, Arabic and Sanskrit, since it is an undeniable fact that these languages cannot be studied in England so well as in India. Englishmen at home desirous of teaching their children German, French or Italian, send them for a sojourn in those countries, and it is quite improbable that a European should get a sound knowledge of an Oriental language by studying it at home.

Remarks on the alleged intention of the Government of India to popularize volunteering among the non-officials and to insist upon the enrolment of Government servants.

7. In alluding to the telegram from Calcutta that the Government of India have determined to set seriously to the work of popularizing volunteering among the non-officials and intend to insist upon its servants enrolling themselves as volunteers, the Jáme Jamshed (107), in its issue of the 16th March, says :—The enrolment of Portuguese, Goanese and other Christians in the Indian Volunteer Corps, excluding the Natives of the country from the concession, has dissatisfied the latter as they believe that the exclusion amounts to a distrust of their loyalty and unnecessarily precludes them from serving their country on an emergency. It is therefore desirable that the present rules for enrolment of volunteers should be so altered as to remove every invidious distinction of race and creed. On an average European non-officials remain in India for about ten years, and the large expenditure incurred for training them as volunteers is lost to this country after that period, and it is urgently needed for the proper extension of the volunteer movement that Government servants of all classes of Natives, drawing upwards of Rs. 50 per month and possessing a tolerable acquaintance with English, should be enrolled as volunteers, and under appropriate rules non-official classes of the Natives should be permitted to enter the corps. The old suggestion to exempt the European volunteer drawing a monthly salary below Rs. 200 from the income-tax has been again brought forward, but it is to be hoped that it will not be adopted by the authorities as it is certain to give rise to a loud complaint from the Natives and to increase the existing dissatisfaction among them.

8. After advising the Native public to express gratitude to the Native Passenger Ships Commission for making in their report appropriate recommendations in regard to several matters, the Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 17th March, says:—In the matter of space to sit or lie down in the passengers suffer great inconvenience, they being packed like sheep. A complaint was made to the Commission on this point, but the remedy suggested by them will not be approved of. It seems from the report that the space allotted to each passenger under the existing law is held sufficient by the Commission who have, however, made a recommendation on the subject evidently considering that this space is not enough. It is recommended that heavy baggage including boxes, &c., should be stowed in the hold and fittings should be used overhead for hanging clothes and securing personal luggage. However, when making this last recommendation the Commission seem to have forgotten the statement made before them by the witnesses that the Natives were not willing to part with their luggage even temporarily and would not consent to its being stored in the hold unless the captain or owner of the vessel was made legally responsible for any portion of the luggage lost or stolen. The remedy for this complaint was suggested by the Bombay Samáchár when the Commission was sitting and taking evidence at Bombay, and Native witnesses expressed their approval of it in the evidence recorded before the Commission. It was recommended by the Samáchár that benches should be provided for passengers as in railway carriages, that luggage may be stowed by each passenger under his own seat, thereby lessening risk to the passengers and annoyance to ship's officers who would be saved from all responsibility of taking care of the luggage. This important suggestion appears to have escaped the notice of the Commission. It however behoves the Dekkanis and Gujarátis travelling along the sea-coast to place this suggestion before the Government of Bombay in a memorial containing other suggestions, if any be found desirable. It is quite wrong on the part of the Bombay Steam Navigation Company to deny to the first and second class passengers anything beyond the bare conveniences of the third class. These passengers are not wealthy as is believed by Mr. J. A. Shepherd, but belong to the middle class, and put on an imposing appearance in order to preserve their respectability. It is no wonder that this class should be neglected by the company which does not scruple to pack like sheep the labouring classes for whom the company thinks that its vessels are essentially designed and intended.

Remarks on the report of the Native Passenger Ships Commission.

9. The Satyavakta (121), in its issue of the 19th March, approves of the general tenour of the report of the Native Passenger Ships Commission, and observes:—The space allotted to each passenger on board a vessel is not sufficient and the Commission's suggestion that the heavy luggage of the passengers should be stowed in the hold is not likely to be acceptable so long as the captain is not held responsible for its safety and sufficient time is not allowed at the ports of disembarkation for receiving back the luggage. The Native community ought to send a memorial to His Excellency the Viceroy on this subject. Mr. Shepherd's explanation about the grievances of the first and second class passengers is unsatisfactory. The well-to-do classes generally travel by rail, and if Mr. Shepherd's steamers are not meant for them he should not offer to carry them; but when tickets are issued to them their convenience and comfort ought to be properly attended to. If the Bombay Government are appealed to in this matter they are sure to remove these complaints.

10. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 15th March, writes:—As usual, considerable interest attaches to Lord Harris's visit to Násik, paid for the opening of the local Tramway. This brief function, combined with the presentation of the addresses of welcome from the local Municipality and the Mahomedan community, gave him an occasion for a declaration of policy, which, though not new, was marked by considerateness and foresight. The value of the principle of self-help, which has been made the text of an admirable treatise by a distinguished English writer, having almost a galvanizing effect on the industrial systems of that country, does not seem here to have acquired marked appreciation with the growth of public spirit. Candid addresses, such as those made by His Excellency Lord Harris's visit to Násik and his replies to the addresses presented there.

His Excellency to the Municipality of Násik and the Mahomedan community of that place, pointing out to the public what they are capable of achieving by self-exertion, are to be welcomed when the rejection of the principle of everything for the people and not by the people as a means of their material advancement comes into increasing favour with those who would further the well-being of the country by an application of Native intelligence. The Municipal address referred to the solicitude of the Governor to see for himself the part of the country he has been called upon to rule, and to know the sentiments and wants of the people, so as to enable him to decide any question on its own merits. The reply of His Excellency on this point was very sensible, and need not be thought as prejudicial to the interests of the people if he showed a reasonable anxiety for consulting official with the popular view of a question side by side. His straightforward reply ought to satisfy the Mahomedans, who preferred a request for the protection of their ináms from aggression. He is a friend of the Mahomedans who would point out to them their shortcomings, and advise them to take their proper place with the other advanced races of this country mainly by their own exertions. The visit of a Governor gives a good opportunity to a Municipality for the ventilation of sanitary and other needs of the locality. A good supply of water seems to be the principal need of Násik, but the plea is advanced that the funds of the Municipality are inadequate for the financing of the work which is estimated to cost about four lákhs of rupees. In the address presented by the Municipality to His Excellency the scheme is commended to the generous consideration of the Government, and a liberal grant from Provincial funds is prayed for. Looking into the financial position of the Municipality His Excellency found that the income of the body was Rs. 49,000 two years ago and the cash balance in hand something over Rs. 63,000, exceeding the income by about 25 per cent. It may seem surprising that a Municipality having enough money to enable it to pay the interest on a loan, and besides provide for a sinking fund, should find it difficult to raise a sum of money which can allow of the scheme being launched. Either the Municipalities asking for aid from Provincial revenues are guided by their own political economy, or the people have not learnt to make profitable investments. It would be good to raise loans, as far as might be, in India, so that the capitalists may learn to invest in important concerns of public utility. The Government might also effect large loans in England, and out of them give sufficient amounts to Municipalities who might be in need of them. The initial danger to be guarded against is, of course, to avoid running into needless debt. Though brief, the speech of Lord Harris at the opening of the Násik Tramway feeder line was encouraging, and his advice to owners of wealth to come forward with investments in such useful works was sound; but unless the Government cease intervening after having once satisfied themselves with the profitableness and utility of a line, the system of feeder lines built by private enterprise will hardly become popular. The address which His Excellency received from the Dhulia Municipality pointed, among other wants, to the same great need of rapid extension of communication by feeder lines. But from the tone of His Excellency's reply it is not difficult to see that there will not be a repetition of such difficulties in case a line of the kind is once taken in hand.

Approaching retirement of the Honourable Mr. Stewart.

11. The same newspaper writes:—By the retirement of the Honourable Mr. Stewart, Bombay loses one of the worthiest members of the Civil Service. Combining knowledge with sympathy, the one as accurate as the other is broad and discriminating, Mr. Stewart has earned for himself the confidence of the Government and the respect of the public. We look upon his retirement just now as especially unfortunate, having heard so much, from independent witnesses, of his knowledge of Revenue and Settlement questions. Many in Bombay like ourselves will regret not having had the benefit of his acquaintance.

Remarks on the Report on A'bkári Administration for the year ending 31st July 1890.

12. The Rást Goftár (87), in its issue on the 15th March, observes:—In the report on the A'bkári Administration for the year ending 31st July 1890, which has been recently published without a Government Resolution thereon, the Commissioner defends and praises his policy which has been universally condemned. Various complaints have been brought to the notice of Government by the press and by memorials, but the absence of an inquiry into any of them shows the weakness of the department. The people complained of experiencing difficulties in obtaining good toddy, but no allusion whatever has been made to the complaints. The right of 'Local Option' has been denied to the districts of Panch Maháls, Thána and Khándesh on the plea that the vice of drinking largely prevails in those districts but their residents will oppose the opening of new grog-shops in order to carry on illicit distillation. This argument falls to the ground as these people are not likely to grudge themselves more convenience, and Municipalities are to be consulted in such a matter and not the people indulging in drinks. The allusion made to this subject by the Ahmedabad Municipality in the address presented to His Excellency Lord Harris at his first visit to that city and other facts show that the A'bkári authorities have not paid much respect to the orders of the Home Government in this direction.

13. After alluding to the conduct of the opponents of the Age of Consent Bill at the meeting of the supporters of the Bill in the Kridábhuwan at Poona, the Subodh Patrika (18), in its issue of the 15th March, says:—The conduct of the police on the occasion is a subject which demands the close attention of the local authorities. For, judging from all accounts, it appears to have been extremely unsatisfactory. The policemen told off for the duty on the occasion either could not or would not perform it. It is essential that a searching inquiry should be made into the cause of it. Any inattention to this matter, though the matter is apparently small, would be fatal to the cause of order at any time, for it would leave the underlings to imagine that their duty was not imperative and might be slurred over at their pleasure. We shall therefore wait to see what action the police authorities of Poona take in sifting the matter to its bottom. Since writing the above we have been told that some of the police who were on duty have been degraded. We do not know how far this is true, but hope all information about the matter will be made public.

Part II.—Legislation.

Enactment of the Age of Consent Bill received with satisfaction.

14. The Bombay Samáchár (94) of the 20th March, and the Jáme Jamshed (107) of the 21st, in noting the enactment of the Age of Consent Bill, observe that there is not the least doubt that the measure has been passed with the best of intentions in the interests of the people of India who should accept it with good grace, particularly when, remarks the Jáme, His Excellency the Viceroy has conveyed assurances that the working of the new law will be closely watched by Government and that if present safeguards against its abuse are found insufficient, further precautions will be immediately taken. The Jáme further says that the interpretation put upon Her Majesty the Queen's Proclamation by His Excellency the Viceroy that the requirements of public morality ought to override those of any of the various religions prevailing in India, ought not to have been advanced on the present occasion as it is likely to prejudice the minds of the people. The religion of the rulers being different from the various religious creeds of the country, it sometimes happens that what is considered morally objectionable by a portion of or the entire people is not so held by the rulers, and vice versâ. It would have been well had the interpretation not been put forward at all.

Disapproval of the Age of Consent Bill.

15. The Dinmani (80), in its issue of the 17th March, observes:—About three centures ago there was no unity among the Native Chiefs of India and then the British Government succeeded by the assistance of an able but cunning officer as Lord Clive in conquering this country. The Age of Consent Bill has been probably introduced to see if there is any unity among the Natives who have started up the National Congress and ask for political enfranchisement. The passing of the Bill in its present form will be very unlucky both for the rulers and the ruled. Government will have to open a new department and, perhaps, a fresh tax will be levied to meet the expenses of the working of the new law, the modesty of young females will be insulted, and highly disastrous consequences to the rulers will ensue.

16. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 16th March, writes:—The meeting of the Anjuman-i-Islam held on Saturday before last at the invitation of Mr. Badrudin Tyebji to express approval of the Age of Consent Bill has given rise to a plentiful crop of unpleasant recriminations. It shows in the Mahomedan community the cloven foot, the disagreement between men of old and new ideas, which is tearing the already too much divided Hindu community into hostile divisions. The Tyebji brothers, Mr. Sayani, Mr. Dharamsy, Mr. Fazulbhoy Vishram and other advanced men are in entire sympathy with the Bill, while the old Kazis and Moulvis, who are incapable of comprehending the spirit of new ideas, are like our Shástris and their followers protesting in the name of religion. The Mahomedans have their Tilaks and Sádhales in the persons of Haji Reazuddin Ahmed and Ghulam Mahomed Munshi. There is no lack of misrepresentation and misunderstanding. The worthy Munshi objects to the Bill because it compels cohabitation at 12! Whatever the amount of ignorant opposition, it is certain, however, that in the Mahomedan as in the Hindu community the most enlightened men are warm supporters of the Bill.

The Mahomedan meeting at Bombay to support the Age of Consent Bill.

17. In alluding to the report of the Select Committee on the Age of Consent Bill, the Rást Goftár (87), in its issue of the 15th March, observes that the opponents of the Bill ought to be satisfied with the recommendations made by the Select Committee, advises them not to oppose the measure any longer, and congratulates the Anjuman-i-Islam of Bombay on its supporting the Bill. [The Surya Prakásh (89), and the Broach Mitra (95), in their issue of the 14th and 18th March, respectively, express similar sentiments.]

Remarks on the report of the Select Committee on the Age of Consent Bill.

18. A correspondent writing to the Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 15th March, says:—The report of the Select Committee is out. The amendment proposed will but in a very small degree reduce the perniciousness of the original Bill. A great alarm has, therefore, been created in the minds of the Hindus. They are trembling with fear seeing that their religion, and their hearth and home are all in danger. When the matter was referred to the Select Committee the people expected that the harsh features of the Bill would be toned down so as to give some sort of reassurance to the ruffled and troubled public mind. They believed that the Bill was based on incorrect and insufficient information and they hoped therefore that the Committee would, after mature consideration and due deliberation, assisted in this matter by the expression of the opinion of vast concourses of people all over the country, suggest important modifications. But these hopes have not been realized and the people have been very much mortified in consequence. The question has now been freely discussed in the columns of newspapers and the Bill has been condemned by the majority of the people in public meetings assembled. The orthodox class with one voice has declared that they do not want the law. Still the Select Committee has recommended the passing of the Bill almost as it is into law. It has now been established by learned Sanskrit scholars that the Bill, if passed into law, would interfere in a tangible way with the religion of the people. The members of the Committee know of the Proclamation of Her Gracious Majesty the Queen-Empress of India; still the Honourable Members of the Committee assert that the Bill appears to them open to no objection. This seems to us to be a riddle. Are the officials determined not to give any heed to the heart-rending cry of the unfortunate people of India? Do they consider it a good policy to trample them under feet because they are helpless and innocent? The Indians never expected that under the benign and civilized rule of England their condition would be worse than under the despotic and oppressive sway of the Moguls. It is universally known that the Indians are loyal to the very core of their heart and that they would rather die than utter even a word of disrespect towards their sovereign. But is this the reward of such deep and heart-felt loyalty? The shástras of the Hindus teach them that the kings are gods on earth. They look upon Her Most Gracious Majesty Empress Victoria as their mother. Such being the case, is it in any way unreasonable on the part of the people to expect that their mother and her agents would hear their cry! Ninety-nine per cent. of the Hindus are crying in one voice, "We do not want this your law, O Mother! It would violate the sanctity of our homes. It would wound our religious feelings. Save us, therefore, O merciful Mother!" The members of the Select Committee have heard these cries. Still they have recommended the passing of the Bill. Who will explain this unheard of obstinacy? It is believed that all the local Governments have given their opinions in favour of the Bill. We knew that such a thing would happen. Those who pose as reformers and talk and write much in regard to their zeal for social reform are considered by the English people as the most enlightened and best-informed persons. The question was referred to these so-called reformers and the opinions of the local Governments most probably have been guided by the views expressed by them. No reference, it appears, was made to the Pandits or the orthodox Hindus in leading positions who are the real leaders of the people in regard to social matters. If what we surmise is true we must say that the local Governments have made a great mistake,—a mistake which it is now too late for them to rectify, but which the Viceroy will, it is hoped, bear in mind when deciding this question.

19. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 15th March, writes:—We are loth to say one unkind word as to the minute of dissent recorded by Sir Romesh Chunder Mitter on the Age of Consent Bill. But for his own reputation we do wish it had not been written, or had been despatched in a few sentences. Then, perhaps, it would not have been so very easy for publicists to run the pen through the elaborate little document. One thing however is certain, that the worthy ex-Judge has strengthened the hands of the reformers more than he seems to be aware of, or is likely to get credit for.

Non-publication in the Sind Official Gazette of the report of the Select Committee on the Age of Consent Bill.

20. The Phœnix (5), in its issue of the 14th March, writes:—One noteworthy fact in connection with the report of the Select Committee on the Age of Consent Bill deserves the attention of the authorities and the public in Sind. The publication of the Bill was ordered by the Council and it was accordingly published in ten Government Gazettes. It was also published in several vernacular languages, viz., Maráthi, Gujaráti, Kánarese, Bengali, Hindi, Uriya and Urdu. But, from the report, it does not appear that the Bill was published either in Sindhi or in English in the Sind Official Gazette. We are, of course, open to correction on this point, but if the report of the Select Committee is correct, the omission appears to be quite unaccountable. Sindhi is the spoken language of an entire province, and its inhabitants form as much a part of the subject population as more fortunate communities. The Bill was published both in English and in vernacular even in the Coorg District Gazette, but Sind has been absolutely ignored as if it formed no part of British India. This is not the first time that this province has been so overlooked. The present omission gains point from the fact, perhaps not generally known, that the Age of Consent Bill owes its origin almost entirely to a Sindhi, to whose persistent, and not the less praiseworthy because anonymous, efforts the inception of the present measure is due.

Approval of the proposed amendment in the Evidence Act.

21. The Svadesh Bandhu (128), in its issue of the 18th March, observes:—At present merchants are required to produce their account-books in Civil Courts in order to prove a claim and are put to great inconvenience if the books are detained in court while the suits are pending. It is equally inconvenient to produce the books before the court at every hearing of a suit. We are therefore glad to learn that a Bill has been brought before the Supreme Legislative Council authorising the Courts to admit true copies of accounts in evidence, and hope it will be soon passed.

Remarks on the new Boilers' Inspection Bill now before the Bombay Legislative Council.

22. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 15th March, writes:—The most important change, perhaps, which the present new Boilers' Inspection Act introduces is that the new Act must apply to what are called technically prime-movers as well as boilers. As far as we can weigh facts and arguments we think this innovation to be both undesirable and unnecessary. Indeed, as yet no data have been put forward on which to support the new legislation on this point. Two members of Council, who both possess a wide knowledge of the subject, are strongly against it. We have already mentioned one of them. The other gentleman is Mr. Javerilál. They both contend that the new Act may be confined to boilers, and that to make the examination of prime-movers compulsory would end in needless vexation, and loss besides, to the proprietors. An examination of prime-movers means that the different parts of the engine must be separated with a view to detect a flaw. Such an examination is not conducted without displacing the brick-work round the engine. If the inspection was indispensable for the protection of life and property, it could be defended. But the fact is alleged to be otherwise. The accidents that take place and have taken place are chiefly owing to faulty boilers and incompetent persons in charge of the machinery. If the bad condition of prime-movers had been a fruitful source of accidents involving loss or injury to life, there would have been sufficient reason for introducing the present alteration. But it was admitted in 1886, when the Act now in force was discussed, that there was no such reason for an inspection of prime-movers as for that of boilers. It was furthermore stated on that occasion that their inspection did not prevent accidents, that rather it might be considered of doubtful value, inasmuch as the parts of the engine pulled together for examination were hurriedly set together to save time. The Legislature found in 1886 valid reason to withdraw from its former position, and did away with the inspection of prime-movers. It is a pertinent question whether any facts have occurred since that year to justify the new piece of legislation anent prime-movers. The question is answered in the negative, as far as we understand, and the answer decides the point so far. We have seen throughout the proceedings of the first day an earnest desire to attend to the arguments of such non-official members as can speak with some authority on a subject of this kind. His Excellency the Governor and Sir R. West both expressed themselves willing to alter the Bill where it could be proved to be mischievous. In free England an Act for the inspection of boilers was not passed till repeated accidents caused loss of life and property. Anything that interferes with the enjoyment of private rights of property is there regarded with great jealousy. A necessity for the exercise of a check must be clearly established before the representatives of the people will permit the State to interfere. In India, on the other hand, we oftentimes find State action called in prematurely, though seldom without good reason.

PART III.—Municipalities.

Remarks in connection with the charges brought by the Bombay Government against the Poona Municipality.

23. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 16th March, observes:—Mr. S. H. Chiplunkar of Poona has written a long letter which is intended to be adopted by the Municipality of Poona in reply to the charges recently brought against the Municipality by the Bombay Government. Mr. Námjoshi has also during the past few weeks written to the dailies on behalf of himself and the Municipality a series of letters dealing with the same charges. Most of the charges formulated by Government in their memorable Resolution of the 6th January have been indeed so powerfully contested by these two gentlemen that it is really a matter for surprise that Government framed its indictment so strongly without at any rate giving the Municipality an opportunity to defend itself. We were among those inclined to judge rather severely the supposed misdoings of the Municipality, but we are glad to observe that there is good ground for revising that judgment. It will be seen from the defence of the Poona Municipality, which two of its members have hitherto made on its behalf, that nearly the whole bill of indictment made by Government against the Municipality is fairly well contested. Only two points have been left unanswered, viz., that in the first case of compensation, the Managing Committee, after the agreement with the owner was drawn up and the amount of compensation finally settled, allowed the vendor to make erections, thus reducing the space left available for widening the street, and that they gave a contract to one Vithu Báláji without taking any formal agreement from him, and made no subsequent efforts to recover his instalments. These two particular cases of careless administration the Municipality, it seems, is not in a position to disown, or else the two gentlemen, who have been strenuously fighting for it, would doubtless have cleared up the points and absolved the Municipality from the blame which attaches to it in respect to them. But assuming that the Municipality is ready to plead guilty to the charge in these two matters, it is not too much to say, in the light of the facts that have been recently put forth in its behalf, that Government, in roundly censuring the Municipality on what turns out to be a merely ex-parte judgment of a Collector did not act on strictly constitutional lines. If the interpretation which Messrs. Chiplunkar and Námjoshi have put on the rules be correct—and it must be admitted the weight of precedent lies in their favour,—the position which Government have so hastily taken up becomes really awkward, and it is but due to the Municipality that they should retrace their steps and modify the judgment they have pronounced against the Municipality in their last Resolution. If it is found that Government have been led into taking a precipitate step it is to be hoped they will not make the Municipality suffer for their own error. If, on the other hand, they have other and more substantial proofs for their accusations against the Municipality, it is due to the public that it should be informed of them. To the public it is in either case an unpleasant position. On the one hand, the Government, the constituted representative of the people in their corporate capacity, seem to have acted with unbecoming haste towards one of the leading Municipalities of the Presidency; on the other, the Municipality stands charged with many acts of indiscretion and breach of duty. It is highly necessary that this should be cleared up and the party really at fault should be charged with its responsibility.

24. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 15th March, writes:—The General Committee of the Poona Municipality will meet on the 19th instant to consider the reply to the charges brought by the Government of Bombay, which has been drafted by Mr. S. H. Chiplunkar. The letters of Mr. M. B. Námjoshi which have appeared in these columns and the columns of the Bombay papers have shown that there is a strong representation possible of the Municipal side. Mr. Chiplunkar's draft reply points to the same thing. It is not our object now to go into the details of the matter, but we feel constrained to say that Government made a serious mistake when they issued a Resolution containing statements which could be very easily controverted as they have been. The Bombay Gazette, which has been ever ready to give a sympathetic hearing to the Municipality but which was so much impressed by the strongly worded Government Resolution as to express surprise at the mildness of the punishment, now sees that there is another side to the question and that, too, a strong side.

25. The Gujaráti (83), in its issue of the 15th March, says:—The hidden motive of condemning the Poona Municipality is said to be to make a suitable provision for Mr. Plunkett, City Magistrate, Poona, who shortly retires on a pension; and if this be true, it does not speak well of the reputation of Government for fairness.

Part IV.—Native States.

Remarks on the reply of the Under Secretary of State for India to a question on the Cambay disturbances asked in Parliament.

26. The Hindustan (106) and the Svádesh Bandhu (128), in their issues of the 15th and 18th March, respectively, consider the reply of Sir John Gorst, the Under Secretary of State for India, to a question put by Mr. Burt in connection with the disturbances which occurred at Cambay in September last, to be unsatisfactory, and request the Committee appointed at Bombay for the purpose of obtaining redress for the people of that State to secure justice to the sufferers from Parliament. The Hindustan observes that it is desirable to inquire into the injustice done to the persons accused of riot at their trial and to take severe notice of the conduct of Mr. Cook, and of Mr. Shámráo and others who may have been the cause of it. The Bandhu remarks that the Under Secretary of State for India seems to have entirely trusted the official reports placed before him, and that when the papers relating to the inquiries made by Mr. James are published and read along with the sufferers' memorial, Sir John Gorst will be induced to order a fresh inquiry.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ā) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Comments on the Indian Budget for 1891-92

1. The Jame Jamshed (107), in its issue of the 25th March, publishes a sarcastic article expressing dissatisfaction with the Financial Statement for 1891-92, just issued, and finding fault with Government for proposing to spend the whole revenue of the country without thinking of either reducing or remitting any tax.

2. The Bombay Samachár (94), in its issue of the 23rd March, expresses similar sentiments, and adds:—The piece of information that the Famine Relief and Insurance Fund has been re-established may appear gratifying to the public, but how long this consolation will last, is doubtful. Out of the fund of a kror and a half a large amount has been very recently appropriated to pay loss on the Indian Midland and Bengal Nágpur Railways, on the ground that railways serve the important purpose of carrying corn to famine-stricken districts and may therefore be held to have been constructed for the protection of the country against famine. The excuse has been cleverly made indeed, but on similar reasoning the Famine Fund may as plausibly be diverted to several other departments of the State and may be totally exhausted as was done before.

3. The Sudhárak (19), in its issue of the 23rd March, gives a summary of the Financial Statement for 1891-92, and says:—Of course, the salt-tax has not been reduced, and the hopes and expectations of the country have been cruelly annihilated. It is a sad circumstance that although the Government has obtained magnificent surpluses, during three continuous years, a policy of "moderation" and "caution" which is only another name for a policy of not lightening the burdens of the poor, should still be persisted in. It is admitted on all hands that the duty on salt at its present rate presses with extreme severity on the struggling millions of the country, and has considerably restricted consumption up to now. The word of the Government, too, has been repeatedly pledged to a policy of reducing this oppressive impost on the first opportunity presented by the finances of the country. In the face, however, of all these facts and promises, although three opportunities came and went, the Government of India did not care to take off the additional burden from the shoulders of the poor,—a burden put upon them at a time of great embarrassment with a distinct promise that it would not have to be borne for a long time. Government has chosen to "restore" the Famine Insurance Fund to its old level of 1½ krors before reducing the salt duty, although the enhancement of the duty was a later affair than the suspension of the Famine Insurance Fund! The country has already borne a burden of nearly 20 krors during the last 13 years for insuring the country against famine, and it might very well have been allowed a respite in that direction, especially as during these 13 years Government has not had to spend more than 50 lakhs on actual famine relief. But strange are the ways of Government!

Governors and other high officers and their receptions at the cost of public funds.

4. The Mahratta (4), in its issue of the 22nd March, writes:—When differential salaries to Indians and Englishmen are in question, they are defended on the ground that the Englishman in consenting to accept service in a foreign country and a hot climate sacrifices much that is dear in life, and for this he must have some compensation. Well, putting aside for a moment the rejoinder that in other places Englishmen have consented to work upon lower salaries, and that many of the sacrifices involved have in these days of improved communication become more imaginary than real, we shall simply rejoin: 'Well, let these gentlemen, then, actually undergo those sacrifices for which they are given recompense in the shape of magnificent salaries, in anticipation. Why should they shirk these sacrifices to the immense disadvantage of the National Exchequer and national weal?' But somehow or other an idea seems to prevail that the tax-payers of the country and Government in abstract, which is their representative, must feel very thankful to these individuals for their simply doing their duties by the people and the State, for which, by the bye, they are very handsomely paid. A Governor attends a prize distribution and makes a speech; he is lauded to the skies for it. In his official capacity he visits a district; he is received in the most extravagant manner by the local body or bodies, and praised to the utmost for his having done so. What on earth is he to do, if not to attend to his duties? And why should he be lauded to the skies for doing nothing beyond his bare duty? No body is against an interchange of common courtesies; they are as indispensable as they are meaningless. But those who have watched such occasions with any attention for a time will not hesitate to agree with us that this interchange of common civilities is often carried too far. And the wonder of it is that no Governor or other high magnate is found to be bold enough to declare, once and for ever, that he will no longer consent to be treated like a veritable Indian son-in-law going to his father-in-law's house. Lord Harris, who has already given sufficient evidence of his practical good sense in all that His Excellency has said and done, will, we pray, issue an intimation before he sets out upon his next tour that if he finds any town, which he may visit, spending its money lavishly on his reception he will view that extravagance with positive displeasure. His Excellency's excellent intentions, by the bye, of living away from the temptations of Mahábleshwar, and in the midst of his sphere of duties as long as possible, as may be seen from the programme of His Excellency's coming tour, are worthy of all praise, and his noble example may be beneficially followed by other Governments.

Comments on the alleged despatch of the Secretary of State for India for local purchase of stores required by Government.

5. In alluding to the assertion made in a recent issue of the Pioneer, that it is believed that a despatch has been received from the Secretary of State for India advocating more extended resort to local manufactures for purchases of stores required by the Government of India, the Jáme Jamshed (107), in its issue of the 27th March, says:—The alleged despatch, if actually received, ought to be hailed with expressions of great joy. Lord Ripon's Government issued in 1882 an order to the local Administrations to purchase local manufactures for the use of State as far as it was practicable. Had this order been faithfully followed the local manufactures would have received considerable impetus and there would have been a large saving from loss by exchange; but the local Administrations did not pay much attention to this salutary injunction which was not also duly appreciated by the Secretary of State who was prohibited from doing it by the vast influence exercised on him by the merchants in England. Except in the purchases of stationery it does not seem that any heed was paid to Lord Ripon's wishes by the authorities here or in England. The State Secretary's insisting upon the vast stores of costly railway material being purchased in England is quite notorious and there is no need for further remark on this subject. It is to be hoped that such a despatch as has been mentioned by the Pioneer has been received and that it will be soon authoritatively published. [The Akhbáre Sodágar (92), in its issue of the 26th March, expresses similar sentiments.]

Remarks in connection with the reply of Government to the Congress, praying for a reduction of the salt-tax.

6. The Rást Goftár (87), in its issue of the 22nd March, writes:—The reply of the Government of India to the memorial submitted by Mr. Mehta as President of the last Congress, praying for a reduction of the salt-tax, is disappointing. It is disappointing in this sense that the Government do not consider that the state of the finances can admit of the reduction of the duty by eight annas per maund. As the salt-tax is one of the most remunerative sources of revenue, so it is also the most unwelcome. The authorities, it may be supposed, would not care to tax this necessary of life two or three thousand per cent. over the cost of production, if other better sources of income were available; and they would not increase the duty unless a financial exigency urgently demanded it. There was such exigency when Lord Dufferin raised the tax from Rs. 2 to Rs. 2-8 per maund, and solemn pledges were given at the time that it would be reduced as soon as the finances admitted of a reduction. Since then there has been a great improvement in the revenue. The last two budgets tell a tale of large surpluses, aye, of surpluses exceeding the estimates. Exchange has risen and dropped often of late, but its fluctuations will result in an average above the rate of 1s. 4$\frac{1}{16}$d. which has been estimated in the Budget, and so the Government will gain considerably by it. But exchange is still a very uncertain item, and Government cannot be blamed for refusing to cut down any large source of revenue in the hope of getting a return from favourable exchange. The opium revenue has been steadily declining, and it is expected that it will be found to be much under the estimate when the Finance Member of the Viceroy's Council will shortly present his budget estimate for the coming year. As the Budget was to be placed before the public shortly after the date of the reply to the Congress memorial, Government have naturally considered it improper to enter into a description of their financial position. We must wait till the publication of the Budget to see whether the time has not arrived when it would be just and expedient to remit the additional duty as prayed for by the Congress. [Several other papers express similar sentiments.]

7. The Sind Sudhar (157), in its issue of the 14th March, writes:—Although the population of India has considerably increased the consumption of salt therein has greatly decreased. In 1887, the quantity consumed amounted to 2,82,03,000 against 2,73,80,000 maunds in 1886. In 1888 the Government of India enhanced the rate of duty from Rs. 2 to Rs. 2-8 per maund. This increase in duty has further reduced the consumption and deprived the poor classes of people of the use of salt. The truth of this statement will be borne out by comparing the following figures:—

Consumption in 1888	...	...	...	2,60,81,000 maunds
Do. „ 1889	...	...	...	2,72,65,000 „

The results of the last census operations have not yet been published, and as soon as they are, the increase of population over the figures of 1881 will be known. By means of these figures it can, also, be judged how many people have been deprived of the means of using the salt owing to the enhancement of duty. In our opinion, it is not proper that Government should levy duty upon any of the necessaries of life. Lord Dufferin, when increasing the duty in 1888, urged, in support of his action, that it was in order to make up the anticipated deficit of upwards of two krors of rupees in the public revenue that he was required to take that step, and announced that as soon as the financial pressure was removed, he would remit the increase. Seeing now that the financial condition has improved and seeing also that for some time to come it is not likely that any heavy expenditure will have to be incurred by the State, it behoves Government to remit the increased rate. The matter was moved in Parliament, and Lord Cross, the Secretary of State for India, himself said that as soon as there was any surplus the increase of duty would be remitted. The Sárvajanik Sabhá has sent a memorial to Government. We hope that the Sind Sabhá will also follow their example. In our opinion Government should fulfil their promise.

8. The Kaiser-i-Hind (86), in its issue of the 22nd March, observes:—The reply given by His Excellency the Viceroy to the memorial from Mr. P. M. Mehta, President of the Sixth National Congress, for reducing the enhanced duty on salt, is very disappointing. His Excellency Lord Lansdowne has been indifferent to the welfare of the people throughout his regimé except in the matter of the Age of Consent Act, and one can hardly expect from him a different course during the remainder of his regimé. A strong case has been made out for the reduction in the salt-tax by the Congress and some other political associations, but since no relief has been obtained in India the matter should be taken before Parliament to whose notice the promise given by Lord Cross last year to reduce the tax should be brought.

9. The Dinmani (80), in its issue of the 24th March, regrets the total absence of the natives of India from the list of successful candidates for the Indian Medical Service Examination held on 9th February last, surmising that this must be due to the unwillingness of the examiners to provide fat appointments to others than their own countrymen.

Alleged cause of the absence of natives of India among the successful candidates at the last Indian Medical Service Examination.

10. The Jagadhitechchhu (15), in its issue of the 21st March, publishes a communication in which the correspondent censures the mode of dispensing justice followed in the Portuguese territory of Goa, observing that one Madársing has been undergoing imprisonment for two years on a charge of making an affray without a trial or investigation, and hopes that this grievance will be redressed by the British Consul at Goa.

Imprisonment without trial in the Portuguese territory of Goa.

11. The Bahul (23), in its issue of the 22nd March, deplores the condition of the prisoners in the jails in India and regrets that Government should find no leisure to devote attention to this matter of great importance. The prisoners in Indian jails, says the paper, are fed on very inferior food, their sleeping accommodation is very wretched, and the amount of work exacted from them is so heavy that even African slaves and beasts of burden are not so overworked. In order to lessen the number of prisoners year by year it is necessary that sound education should be imparted to them in leisure hours, but nothing of the kind, regrets the paper, is done. Female convicts, adds the paper, are treated in the jails very cruelly by cutting their hair and breaking their glass bangles, and this state of things is very deplorable and it behoves Government to remedy it.

12. The Jâme Jamshed (107), in its issue of the 24th March, says:—The Poisons Act of 1866 has been sufficiently long in existence to require a complete revision. And while it has been in existence it has afforded ample opportunity to a would-be or a professional poisoner. The public has never had any difficulty in purchasing poisonous substances, whether the poisons are included in the Act or not. Persons engaged in trade or agriculture are permitted to purchase the poisons enumerated in the Act in wholesale quantities, and there is nothing to prevent these persons from retailing them in large quantities. The Act places no efficient restraints upon the sale of poisons. Now some poisons have a lethal effect in very minute doses; some are tasteless, some produce one kind of symptoms, some another kind, some act speedily and some tardily. All the poisons produced in India are well known to the people, and so are their doses and effects. Only thirteen poisons are enumerated in Schedule A of the Act. Besides these there are many others to be purchased in the local market which are not included in Schedule A, and may therefore be bought and sold in any quantities without any question being asked. Two of the most deadly poisons are not included in the schedule; these are prussic acid and strychnia. The recent case of poisoning by strychnia has brought this poison prominently to the notice of the public. It is imported in large quantities; one druggist alone has received one hundred ounces in conveniently small bottles containing one ounce each. A sale has recently been reported at twenty-two grains for one rupee. The profit of such a sale is, of course, very considerable. But the poison is probably usually sold to druggists at wholesale prices. Schedule A of the Act discloses that no license is necessary for the sale of strychnia, and the public is alarmed at the large quantity that is available in Bombay. The sooner we have a good Poisons Act the better.

An amendment of the Poisons Act of 1866 desired.

13. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 23rd March, writes:—The report of the Native Passenger Ships' Commission, which held its sittings here some weeks ago, is quite barren as far as the general public of this Presidency is concerned. The complaints about the discomfort of passengers have been totally disregarded and the passenger-ship companies have been given compliments in the bargain. The Commission quote without comment the cynical remark of Mr. Shepherd that he would rather not have first and second class passengers on board his steamers since he intends them for the poorer classes. But what has he done for the comfort of those classes too? The Commission does not care to enquire into this subject and has no suggestions to offer. Then what was the Commission appointed for? Regulations about charts and instruments would easily have been framed by a study of the regulations in use in England and elsewhere. It was precisely for a study of local conditions about passengers' grievances that the Commission was appointed, and in that object it has, we are bound to say, signally failed.

Remarks on the report of the Passenger Ships' Commission.

14. In noticing the Government Resolution regarding the refusal of the authorities of the European General and Kâma Hospitals to admit a widow named Mrs. Susan King, since deceased, the Bombay Samdeshár (94), in its issue of the 23rd March, says:—The Resolution passes a mild rebuke on the conduct of Surgeon Collie of the European General Hospital and of Miss Macdonald and Comments on the Government Resolution in connection with the death of Mrs. Susan King who was refused admission into the European General and Kâma Hospitals.

Miss Walke, the lady doctors at the Káma Hospital, and furnishes one more instance of how much Europeans in general and Government also are anxious to pass over the faults of their countrymen. Haughty Europeans consider the natives of India quite inferior to them and act unjustly towards them. It seems that this feeling of assumed superiority has been extended by these proud and insolent men towards poor or lower-class of Europeans and the Eurasians who are held by them to be just as bad as the Natives. The Eurasians had better think over this treatment of them before exhibiting an over-anxiety to follow and copy Europeans.

15. In writing on the same subject, the Jáme Jamshed (107), of the same date, observes that the Resolution is not satisfactory, and says:—Since it has been proved that some of the menial staff at the European General Hospital have been inattentive to the patients, it may not be improper to believe that a similar treatment is given by the hospital servants to the patients at the several hospitals where Natives alone are admitted, and to desire that an enquiry ought to be instituted into the matter by Government, particularly when the Native patients have no means of carrying their complaints to the authorities. Seeing that the death of Mrs. Susan King has led to the issue of a Resolution from Government on the subject, it is quite natural that Natives should deplore that similar steps were not taken in the cases wherein two or three unfortunate Natives died some time ago on account of a refusal of admission into the local hospitals.

Annual inspection of the Subordinate Courts by a Judge of the Bombay High Court recommended.

16. The Gujarát Darpan (82), in its issue of the 26th March, approves of the practice of one of the Honourable Judges of the Calcutta High Court paying annual visits to the Subordinate Courts, and recommends the Bombay Government to get a similar practice introduced in this Presidency. The Darpan complains of the delay caused in the District Judge's Court at Surat in disposing of the civil suits brought about five years ago by the creditors of the Baila Mill, and says that such a state of things can hardly continue if the system of annual visits is introduced.

Remarks on the Advocate's Examination in Bombay.

17. The Gujaráti (83), in its issue of the 22nd March, writes:—One of the rules of the Advocate's examination in Bombay is that a Bachelor of Laws must commence filling up his terms before the expiration of five years after taking his degree of LL.B. We do not know what the object of this anomalous restriction is. No such prohibition is to be found with respect to any other examination. There is certainly no earthly reason why a High Court Pleader of more than five years' standing should be debarred forever from presenting himself for the Advocate's examination, unless of course one is prepared to maintain that all sorts of meaningless impediments should be placed in the path of Indian students. It would, of course, be easy to understand the justice or reasonableness of such a rule if there were some provision by which High Court Pleaders were entitled to practise on the Original Side after some years' standing. But all doors are closed against them. The second rule which seems to us wholly indefensible on any grounds whatever is that immediately after filling up terms one must apply to be examined. After a daily attendance at the Court for nearly four or five hours, candidates cannot find much time for study, and to compel them to submit to an examination in which every thing is provokingly vague and indefinite soon after their terms are completed, amounts virtually to killing them by over-work or driving them to court a certain failure in the examination. We know no University examination which imposes such a harassing restriction on candidates. Students appearing for the highest examinations in Medicine and Engineering are not fettered by any such rules. Those appearing for the M.D., the LL.B. or Solicitor's examinations are at liberty to appear for their respective examinations at any time after their prescribed terms have been filled up. The absurdity of the rules will become the more patent when it is remembered that a candidate who has failed in the Advocate's examination is at liberty to appear again when he is ready for it without again filling up terms. The process of failure in the examination and re-appearing for it has only to be repeated and then one is able to evade successfully the operation of this unintelligible restriction. We respectfully invite the attention of the present learned Chief Justice of the High Court to this anomalous state of things.

The Bombay Tramway Company, Limited, and frequent accidents on tram lines regretted.

18. The Din Bandhu (10), in its issue of the 22nd March, refers to a tramway accident to Rao Saheb Ganpatráo Malhár Bokad, and says:—The driver and the conductor of the tram-car are mostly to be blamed for this accident. As usual the speed of the car was slackened a little, but before the Ráo Sáheb could secure a footing on the step-board the driver again let go the car at full speed. The illiterate and arrogant servants of the Tramway Company ought to receive a warning to be more cautious in future. Accidents on tram lines are becoming more frequent than those on all the Railways in India combined. Several persons have lost their lives, and yet we see no improvement in the management of the Bombay Tramway Company.

The Bombay Tramway Company, Limited, and a request to Government to order certain changes in the regulations of the Company.

19. In alluding to Tramway accidents, the Rájyabhaktá (118), in its issue of the 24th March, observes:—The Tramway Company has no doubt afforded great convenience to the public, but care should be taken to guard against accidents occurring frequently. The Company ought to be compelled by Government to attend to the following precautionary measures:—(1) If a tram-car is not stopped when passengers get in or out the conductor ought to be fined; (2) the speed of the cars should be fixed and the Company should pay the cost of widening streets through which the line passes; (3) the number of passengers on each bench should be 4 and the Company's servants should be very civil to passengers.

Part II.—Legislation.

Approval of the passing of the Age of Consent Bill.

20. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 22nd March, writes:—The passing of Sir Andrew Scoble's Bill on the Age of Consent will be acknowledged as a triumph, so far, of cautious but firm statesmanship. Well may its author take credit to himself for this success of a measure which, small and restricted as it is, is still a most substantial instalment of actual relief from suffering, vouchsafed to the child-wives of India, in spite of the dead set made against it by a few upholders of monopoly in human flesh, by a large body of religious and political bigots and by a much larger mass of unthinking men, born, as it were, to do their masters' bidding. We cannot speak too highly here of the attitude taken by His Excellency the Viceroy and Sir Andrew Scoble. If the present Government could not come up to our expectations all at once, there is this to be said to their credit, namely, that they have acted on behalf of the orphans of society, besides going through the more easy process of speaking in that behalf. This record of India's gratitude would be incomplete without a mention of the valuable services rendered to the cause by Mr. Krishnáji Nulkar. But for his presence in the Supreme Council during the acute crisis now over, and but for his resolute stand on the grounds of justice and humanity, one knows not where the Bill might have drifted in the hurricane that has swept over it for six weeks on that side of the Hughly. Not that there was the slightest doubt as to its safety. But the game of amendments was kept up so briskly by the Garbhádhánists that one felt rather uneasy on that account. Mr. Nulkar shows that the Marátha has not yet lost his governing capacity. The age limit at twelve has doubtless disappointed him, as it has disappointed many others. Of that, perhaps, on some future occasion. Meantime, we beg to repeat our thanks to Mr. Nulkar, to the Rája of Bhinga, and to all their European colleagues in Council, who in supporting the measure so cordially and unanimously, have shown true loyalty to their conscience and their Queen. To the supporters of the Bill outside the Council Hall is due an equal meed of praise. We refer especially to the Hindu supporters in this place. Of the Mahomedans we were certain. Our Hindu friends really deserve the credit of having secured the vindication of a great principle. Madras, Punjab, the North-West Provinces, and other Administrations of British India; the Native States, and, the best of them all, Bombay—all these have acquitted themselves in a most handsome manner. Need we say more about Bengal than that it should not be judged harshly for the temporary aberrations of some of its leaders? The real leaders of men there have acted as honourably as could be expected; indeed, they have had a harder fight of it. But to our own Presidency belongs the honours of the victory more than to others. The Age of Consent question was first mooted in these columns by a Hindu gentleman who is content to describe himself as a "Vedic Hindu," but who, nevertheless, combines in himself the best traditions of the faith and culture of our common ancestors, with some of the best results of modern civilization of the West. This gentleman was supported by other Hindus of note all over the country, never so strongly as within the last few weeks, and nowhere so much as in Bombay. So that, really, it has been a Hindu movement throughout, initiated, kept up and carried to a successful issue by Hindus of various shades of opinion and all degrees of Indian and European culture. Theirs has been the struggle throughout; and theirs is now the victory. It remains for this journal only to add that we sympathize with them in their hour of triumph as heartily as we sympathized with them during three long years of trials and disappointments.

21. The Subodha Patrika (18), in its issue of the 22nd March, writes:—The Age of Consent Bill has at last become an Act, and we may well exclaim in the words of a Madrasee brother, "All hail to the supreme legislators of the Indian Empire who had resolved to pass it into law as a triumph of reason over so-called orthodoxy, and of humanity—we should add, of decency, too,—over the brutal promptings of a beastly passion!" The unholy cause of opposition to this small measure of protection to tender female innocence from premature acquaintance with enforced carnality had everywhere been based ostensibly on the injunctions of religion and on the authority of the sacred Shástras, while in Bengal, in addition to these invocations, appeals had been addressed to the Goddess Káli as the Universal Mother! What a religion, what Shástras, what a goddess, and what votaries! Yet, it is these last who alone are responsible for the degrading notion. For, if they are sincere believers in the sacredness of the injunctions and the divinity of her who is no voluptuous Venus but the stern destroyer of demons, they ought to have seen that to pray to her to safeguard the indulgence of a demon passion at the expense of her tender daughters on earth was double blasphemy. It is a mercy that a measure, which no right-thinking man and kindly-hearted woman, as the Honourable Mr. Nugent said, or as we should put it, no right-thinking woman or kind-hearted man but would cordially welcome, has been passed in spite of the senseless storm of opposition, which has been, through astuteness and misrepresentation, got up against it.

22. The Hitechchhu (85) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 26th March, and four other newspapers of Gujarát, observe that right-thinking people are glad that the Age of Consent Bill has passed into law in spite of the strong opposition from the orthodox.

23. After alluding to the case of the Mahomedan child-wife, barely ten years old, who was hung by her husband after making an indecent attack on her, the Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 23rd March, says:—This unfortunate Mursheedabad case is one of a kind that very rarely occurs, but there can be no doubt that the evil practice of immature cohabitation arising from child marriages leads to several cases of child-wives being injured for life and their health being irrecoverably shattered that never come to the notice of the public. This state of things ought to show how much the Indian child-wives stand in need of legal protection which has now been fortunately extended to them by the Age of Consent Act for the passing of which every reasonable Native is sincerely thankful to Government.

24. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 23rd March, writes:—

Passing of the Age of Consent Bill approved, and further steps to be taken by the people suggested.

The Age of Consent Bill, which has been agitating the Indian world for the last two months, has at last been passed into law. In passing the measure the Government has shown a firmness which must be highly commended. There was indeed a general expectation from the outset that the Government would be firm. The duty of good Government, prestige, and the public weal— all these considerations pointed to one conclusion, that the Government would persevere with the Bill, and maintain it to the last in its essential principles. In fact, Government would have betrayed its high trust if it had surrendered its position. The passing of the law is indeed a matter for satisfaction, but not for elation or triumph. It is a small measure in itself. It is essentially a measure of protection and in only a secondary sense one of social reform. As an amendment of the criminal law its necessity and usefulness are unquestionable. From the social aspect its real usefulness lies in its moral influence. To realize the full benefit from its use as a moral force the people must respond to it by acting in accordance with its spirit. This law itself does not prohibit early marriage. It only postpones cohabitation for some time. In places where the practice of early cohabitation prevails it will be a real blessing; where no such practice is in existence it will be nugatory. As a help to social reform its moral effect must be to raise the age of marriage, and to secure this effect it must be followed up by active work in the way of educating public opinion. What we mean is, those who are earnest about social reform must not look upon the passing of the measure as the end-all and be-all of their activity and rest on their oars. The passing of the Bill was necessary as an assertion of a principle, and the effort to get it passed was necessitated by the excessively wild and insane cry raised against it. The opponents have done incalculable mischief by raising all manner of false issues, by degrading our people and our religion in the eyes of the civilized world, and by working the people into a fit of excitement in which they lost all self-possession. The friends of reform have to undo all these mischiefs, to re-assure the people, to heal up lacerated sores, and to induce the people to voluntarily turn to the path of reform. One of the first steps to take in such a cause is to properly instruct the public at large as to the true scope of the law just passed, and to use the occasion for impressing upon the public mind the desirability of raising the age-limit for marriage so as to escape any chance of the penalties of the law of which they are so much in terror. Pamphlets and leaflets in the vernaculars, stating precisely the law as now amended, removing misconceptions, and pointing out the necessity of a forward move should be distributed, and reports of the debate in the Council and the proceedings of the Javer Bág meeting, which latter have been already printed, may also serve as valuable aids in instructing public opinion. There is already some awakening of the public mind in consequence of the recent agitation, and the interest thus awakened should be kept up by further efforts.

Disapproval of the passing of the Age of Consent Bill and the steps to be taken by the people.

25. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 22nd March, writes:—It has pleased Gevernment to pass the Age of Consent Bill into an Act; and Government expects that the agitation which has been exciting the minds of the nation will now subside. Government, we know, has been made to believe that the agitation against the Bill is all a got-up affair. They have been told that it is all the work of a few wire-pullers. If it were so the anticipation of Government would be certainly correct. But we have been in the thickest of the fight and we are therefore in a position to say that Government has been misinformed. The agitation is genuine and as such it is bound to continue. The passing of the Bill did not come by surprise. It was anticipated and people had already thought about the course to be adopted when the Viceregal Council should make its decision public. At the Sholápur mass meeting a resolution was passed to the effect that if the Viceroy in Council took the bold step of passing the Bill steps should be taken to appeal to the sense of the English nation, and we learn on the best authority that effect will be very soon given to the resolution of the Sholápur meeting. Before a deputation is sent to England some work in India itself has to be done, and we take the earliest opportunity of bringing this to the notice of the public, so that the way of the deputation may be paved. The programme of Indian work is easy and simple and we have little doubt that it will be gone through as early as may be practicable. The first work to be done is about religious objection to the Bill. Government still adheres to its opinion that the Bill does not violate any religion. This opinion is based upon the advice given to them by the school of modern interpreters of the sacred texts led and represented by Dr. Bhándárkar and the Honourable Mr. Telang. And our first duty is to examine the right of these people to pronounce a decision in matters relating to our Shástras. If they are competent judges and if they have given a decision that ought to be respected, let us bow down to their decision and give up the religious objection as a false issue. But if they are not competent to pronounce such a decision or if they have given a wrong opinion let us openly declare that we refuse to accept their decision and inform Government in most unequivocal terms that Government has erred in accepting their advice. This religious objection thus disposed off, we must next examine the right of the well-known supporters of the Bill to be our leaders in these matters. If they have any just claims let us follow their lead by all means; but if they have none, let us undeceive them and ourselves. Let this matter be decided first before proceeding with our work. So far about the work of destruction. This has to be followed by constructive work also. It consists of constituting a grand central association the principal work of which body should be that of self-preservation, self-protection and self-support. In this association we must enlist the sympathies of those only who are prepared to stand or fall upon the strength of their own independent work whether it is that of social or political reform; whether it is educational or industrial; whether it is that of revival or survival. Loyalty to Government will of course be the sine qua non of the essential conditions of the existence of the grand association we have to build up. In order that this association may not come in conflict with some of the existing institutions we might make some provisions. Those who have by their conduct made a confession of their moral weakness or those that have betrayed their nation by directly or indirectly misrepresenting us to our rulers, or those who have abused the trust reposed in them by the people, will naturally have no place in this association. Let us then chalk out a programme of our work—social, political and religious; and let it be carried out honestly. The most important and, we might say, the first, work that will have to be done under the auspices of the association will be to remove the mischievous impression that has been created both here and in England both as regards our social and religious customs and our aims and aspirations. It is a patent fact that we have been mischievously and shamelessly represented as a nation of savages and the Sudháraks have shamelessly testified to it. Let these Sudháraks therefore form themselves into a separate nationality. They are unfit to be amongst us. Let them join the ranks of those who took such a prominent part against us at the time of the Ilbert Bill. The Age of Consent Bill agitation is the third great question raised during the last ten or twelve years, and we have learnt during this period that we can afford to treat our enemies with generosity because, whatever they say or do, they do openly. But we ought no longer to allow to be amongst us those of our fellow-countrymen who are really our enemies but who pose as our friends. The time has come when we should divide. The Age of Consent agitation has given us an accurate idea of our strength and our weakness, and the longer we continue together the more rapid will be our ruin. Having done so, let us publicly approve or disapprove the recent measure and proceed to carry out our work. The wounds that the Sudháraks have inflicted cannot be healed; the mischief they have done is irreparable and it will not do to reconcile ourselves to the humiliating position they have placed us in. We must not allow ourselves to be blinded. The pill administered may be golden, but internally it is poisonous and we ought not to swallow it. If your religion is tampered with by the Bill, how can you silently look on? If our "home" is attacked, how can we afford to quietly submit? If national aspirations are blighted, how can we allow our enemies to enjoy themselves at our expense?

26. The Native Opinion (16), in its issue of the 26th March, writes:—The Age of Consent Bill has after all been passed in the teeth of the whole country. We never thought that the Government would be so blind to what was passing around. The manner in which it has ignored the representations of the people is entirely unworthy of it. The best way for it would certainly have been to withdraw the Bill as demanded by the nation; but in the absence of that the next best course would have been to amend it on the lines of popular opinion indicated by both the supporters and the opponents of the measure. Sir

R. Mitter's absence from the Council Board at this critical juncture on account of serious illness was indeed a misfortune; especially as there was none to second his single-handed struggle against odds. In his absence the whole ground was clear. There could be no motion for amendment; no division upon it. The whole affair was consequently a huge farce, that of reading the prepared essays. The country might have been well spared that; the members too would have been saved an amount of trouble. We can recall to our mind no occasion on which the Government set at naught so strong, so wide-spread, and so genuine an opposition. On no occasion was the country so much stirred. It was indeed a novel spectacle to see the generally lethargic Hindus and Mahomedans driven into such a furore all over the country. And was this unreal? Was it due to wire-pulling? Let those who have the hardihood, say so, but we never shall. By the side of this opposition the one by the Europeans at the time of the Ilbert Bill becomes pale. It was purely sentimental and full of factious spirit. It was not, moreover, universal. The present one was not of that character. The Government listened even to that opposition then and adopted a compromise. Why has it not done so now? Is it because the opponents then were strong-headed Europeans and not mild Hindus and Mahomedans? We are sure if the Government had now been presided over by Lord Ripon, some sort of compromise would have been arrived at and the opposition reconciled. That would have been wise statesmanship. A policy of that kind on the present occasion would have heightened the prestige of the British Government. Now that the Bill has been passed by sheer force, what is the duty of the people who do not want it altogether or who want it to be amended? Are they to remain silent? No. If they have been unheard before one tribunal, let them carry their case before a higher one. There is not much chance of justice at the hands of the State Secretary. Let him however be tested first if constitutionally necessary. The best tribunal in our opinion is the House of Commons, and there we are sure to have justice. Let, however, our representations be sober, and not sensational.

27. In alluding to the passing of the Age of Consent Bill into law, the Káside Mumbái (110), in its issue of the 23rd March, observes that the Queen's Proclamation does not authorize Government to interfere in the religious rites of the people, since every religion is based on principles of morality, advising at the same time the opponents of the Bill not to protest against it any more as it is now become law and it is good to respect the rulers.

28. The Káthiáwár Times (3), in its issue of the 23rd March, writes:—In passing the Age of Consent Bill in the face of overwhelming opposition from the people whom it vitally affected, the Government of India have hardly acted discreetly. Those whom the Bill did not affect said anything and everything they liked in support of the Bill, and thus strengthened the hands of Government. The Bill, as has been so often pointed out, is defective in various aspects and will make people fall back upon infant marriages. In passing the Bill it would seem that the Government have taken advantage of the mild Hindu nature, forgetful at the same time how far it has alienated itself from the sympathies of the people. The Bill is passed simply, it would appear, to satisfy the crochets of a few persons. It is passed in indecent haste and perhaps wholly under pressure from home and in utter defiance of Indian public opinion. The Bill is likely to remain a dead law, and will have, we fear, to be repealed very soon.

29. The Poona Vaibhav (54), in its issue of the 22nd March, observes:—The passing of the Age of Consent Bill by the Supreme Legislative Council, notwithstanding the general public opinion condemning the measure, shows that it is useless to hold National Congresses and to make petitions to Government, and that it is necessary to find out other means to make Government accede to our demands. If Government make light of the public opinion of the whole country, no purpose can be served by spending millions of rupees in the hope that Government will grant representative Legislative Councils. Granting that representative or elective Councils are conceded, what is the use of having Councillors like Messrs. Nulkar, Bhándárkar, Telang, &c., and why should we employ such assassins against ourselves? Better it is to bear in mind that the English are foreigners, that their rule is not parental but cruel, and that the less one has to do with them the better, and to pray to God and wish well of the country.

30. The Kesari (43), in its issue of the 24th March, resents the passing of the Age of Consent Bill by the Viceregal Legislative Council, and says that the people of India must acknowledge that the British Government is able to rule over India by its great might and that the people are so helpless that the British Government can, like the Mahomedans with the Koran in one hand and the sword in the other, make them drink wine and send them to "the Father in Heaven." The oppression which, says the paper, the British Government is practising on the people under pretext of humanity is such that the like of it could not be found even under the Mogul rule. The paper thinks that it would be better that the Viceroy's word should be supreme than that there should be irresponsible Councils and Councillors like those who put the trammels of the Age of Consent Bill on the people in spite of their remonstrances. In conclusion, the paper advises the people to renew their efforts for the reform of the Indian Councils and to disown the so-called reformers as their leaders. [Several other papers express disappointment at the passing of the Age of Consent Bill.]

31. The Dinmani (80), and the Rájyabhaktá (118), in their issues of the 24th March, disapprove of the Age of Consent Act. The former adds that the new law is a violation of the Queen's Proclamation of 1858 and has made the people suspicious, while the latter observes that this law is more oppressive than the Press Act passed under the regimé of Lord Lytton and that Government have been unwise in framing it.

32. The Ahmedabad Times (90), in its issue of the 25th March, regrets that the Age of Consent Bill should have been passed into law within short time when Bills of lesser importance were passed after allowing a long time for ascertaining public opinion, and says:—It is a mistake to expect that all orthodox Natives will go against their scriptures and respect the law, and we are afraid that after some persons have been punished under the new law the peace of the country will be disturbed and serious consequences will ensue. Government have exercised their autocratic power in framing the Act, but they must remember the proverb "Pride goeth before destruction." [The Satyavakta (121), in its issue of the 27th March, disapproves of the Age of Consent Act and does not expect any changes in the Act in order to prevent its abuse until something serious takes place as in 1858.]

Disapproval of the disregard by Government of the amendments in the Age of Consent Bill suggested by various meetings of the people.

33. The Gujaráti (83), in its issue of the 22nd March, writes:—The Protected Age Bill has at last received the final approval of the Viceregal Council. The whole of Thursday's sitting was taken up with a discussion of the objections that have been urged against the measure. We are sorry Sir Romesh Chunder Mitter could not attend the meeting owing to serious indisposition. The speeches of the learned mover as well as of the Viceroy concerned themselves mainly with Sir Romesh Chunder Mitter's note. Though the telegraphic report of the proceedings is of a meagre character, it is clear that Sir Andrew Scoble as well as the Honourable Mr. Nugent spoke with a little more warmth than was manifested at the first sitting of the Council. Lord Lansdowne's speech seems to have been marked by that judicial calmness and conciliatory spirit which characterised his first memorable speech. Only two modifications have been introduced by the Council, viz. that offences by husbands shall be tried by higher classes of Magistrates and investigated by superior Police officers. We do not think that the Committee acted wisely in disregarding some of the useful suggestions that were thrown out at various public meetings held in the country. Surely there was nothing unsound in the proposal that an entirely different section should be introduced for dealing with the offences in question in view of the existing marriage customs in the country. Again, in the interests of the wives themselves, it was thought that offending husbands should be dealt with more leniently than a ruffian who outrages a woman. In both these respects popular opinion as reflected in the meetings of the supporters as well as the opponents of the Bill has been summarily set aside. The Bill might prove a dead letter, and we hope that it will be so. At the same time, it is obvious that a foreign Government has not cared to make even innocent and reasonlabe concessions to popular opinion. The Viceroy has promised that the operation of the Act will be vigilantly watched and that further safeguards might be introduced, if found necessary. We hope such a contingency will not arise and that the Act will prove harmless and beneficial in accordance with the anticipations of the Legislature.

Passing of the Indian Factory Bill, and remarks thereon.

34. The Gujarát Mitrá (84), in its issue of the 22nd March, writes:—After a debate of less than three hours the Indian Factory Bill was passed simultaneously with the Age of Consent Bill. It is a pity men like Messrs. Bliss and Nugent should have displayed adverse feeling to a measure which is a compromise between the interests of the manufacturers of England and India. We consider the new law to be the wisest course that could be adopted in the dual interests of Indian factory-owners and their operatives.

Remarks on the report of the Select Committee on the new Boilers Inspection Bill.

35. The Kaiser-i-Hind (86), in its issue of the 22nd March, writes:—The Select Committee on the new Boilers Inspection Bill seems to have completed its report with commendable promptitude and good sense. It is satisfactory to observe from the report that many of the amendments proposed by the Honourable Mr. Wadia have been adopted. That was a foregone conclusion. The Committee has however acted somewhat inconsistently by recognising the inexpediency of retaining in the Bill the provision regarding the inspection of prime-movers and at the same time authorising the Inspector to examine it at his absolute discretion! It is very properly remarked that under the existing state of circumstances it is obvious "the occasions for such application must be extremely rare, and should such occasions arise, it will be within the competence of the Government to provide for them by future legislation." And yet in the face of this declaration a clause is tackled at the end which more than neutralises the efficacy of the admission made regarding the inutility of examining prime-movers. We can, therefore, rightly understand the Honourable Mr. Forrest's objection, though its nature is not stated, as to the provision being accompanied by making it compulsory on owners to follow the Inspector's advice. Who is to be the arbiter to decide that that advice is sound and reasonable? If the Government is anxious that its Inspector should, when needed, inspect engines and insist upon users of steam power taking his advice, it is morally bound, in justice to the latter, to appoint first class men in whose theoretical and practical knowledge of prime-movers reliance can be placed. Is the Government prepared to appoint such an officer? If not, there are only two courses left to which we beg to draw the attention of the Council, especially the attention of the three non-official members who are more or less conversant with the subject. Either the Council should insist on the new provision being omitted at the second reading of the Bill or have it qualified by an appeal. That is to say, the Inspector shall not be allowed on his own ipse dixit to insist on changes being effected in the prime-movers, but that steam-users so asked to make alterations, shall be entitled to submit the matter to an appellate Court of two qualified Engineers, one of whom should be a nominee of Government and the other of the party appealing. As the provision now stands, we are afraid, it is worse than useless, and liable to be worked harshly, and sometimes, maliciously. The other amendments of a technical character may be said to be in the right direction, and we do not think steam-users will take any objection to them. The absurdity of "economisers" and "appurtenances" of a kindred character being subjected to examination was so palpable, that we are glad the section relating thereto has been considerably modified in harmony with the views expressed by Mr. Wádia. We are also glad to observe that that Honourable gentleman has been so far able to convince the Honourable Mover of the Bill as to allay that hysteric fear he conjured regarding the poor devil of an Inspector being converted into "boiled meat" if a boiler under examination were not "isolated" from working boilers in contiguity to it. The whole passage in which the modification is described is worth transcribing for its ready conversion to the views of the practical expert in the Committee. How much is it to be wished that the same spirit of concession to educated and authoritative opinion which breathes throughout the passage would characterize the proceedings of our legislators in other pieces of legislation. So much for the difference between arm-chair and practical legislation. Our Wests and Pritchards are so viciously wedded, generally speaking, to their pet theories and fancies, that we publicists heave a sigh of pleasant relief when we find them subordinating their infallibility in legislation to matured practical opinions. Is it possible that with a Mr. Dántra in the Legislative Council we may expect from the self-opinionated and perverse Mr. Pritchard the same spirit of tolerance and ready acquiescence to his undoubted experience of the hardship and oppression arising from the operations of the Á'bkári Act, specially in reference to poor boy-cotted toddy? But this is a digression. On the whole, we are rejoiced to see that the new Bill, when passed, will be every way a great improvement on the old, and the Govenment is to be congratulated on it on behalf of the disinterested public who is solicitous of the safety of all classes of people employed in factories, especially of those who are engaged on boilers.

PART III.—Education.

35. The Broach Samáchar (96), in its issue of the 26th March, observes:—

A complaint against frequent changes of text-books in High Schools and a request to the Educational Department in the matter.

Students in High Schools are put to great inconvenience by frequent changes of the text-books. This inconvenience is much felt on account of new books being prescribed on every occasion which means expense. We would request the Educational Department to revive the old practice of teaching the same books for a number of years.

36. The Native Opinion (16), in its issue of the 22nd March, writes:—

Primary education and school buildings in the Ratnágiri District.

To those interested in the sacred cause of the education of our rising generations, it will indeed be a revelation when we tell them that the present arrangements for imparting a knowledge of the rudiments of education are quite inadequate and such as will never be tolerated even for a day in England or, for the matter of that, in any advanced country in Europe. What with the extremely meagre salary of the teachers or the disgraceful construction and arrangements of the school-houses, it is indeed a matter of astonishment to us how matters are allowed to remain as they are at present. It will indeed be perceived by anybody that the salary varying from Rs. 30 or 35 as the maximum down to Rs. 6 or 7 a month, is hardly sufficient to attract teachers competent enough to instil the nectre of knowledge into the minds of the children attending the schools in the most efficient manner. Their lot, now that the primary schools have been transferred to the Municipalities, is lamentable indeed, for in several places they do not receive, it is said, their paltry salaries every month; for want of funds they often remain in arrears for months together. The school appliances too are not of the most approved pattern. But the cause of our complaint is the construction of the school-houses. In this connection, we for the present confine our remarks to the school buildings in the Ratnágiri District. A single visit to these schools will show that they are fitted not for the purpose for which they are built but for public meetings or lecture-halls or for court-houses. They are nothing but mere single halls of the size of the drawing rooms in the mansions of our wealthy persons and within such a hall is accommodated the whole school consisiting of the different classes for the different standards, four, five, or six. There is not only no separate room with pakka walls for each class, but the hall is not even partitioned with planks, canvass, or matting. We ask, under these circumstances, how is it possible for the teachers to concentrate their attention upon what they have to teach, or, still more, for the urchins to concentrate their attention upon what their teachers say. With all the classes in view of all teachers as well as pupils, concentration on the part of either is in our opinion impossible. Besides the inevitable hubbub, there are serious causes for distraction. Here a teacher canes a boy; he cries and draws the attention of all towards him. There a teacher loudly gives vent to his wrath against any of his pupils, and all suddenly turn towards him. It is needless to mention the thousand and one similar causes of distraction. Not only this, the teachers and pupils cannot properly hear each other. To realize the whole disgraceful situation one has simply to see the school-building for himself. No wonder then our rising generations are so imperfectly educated. The whole affair is nothing but a mockery, an unmitigated sham, unworthy of a Government whose chief boast is to civilise the people of this backward country.

Government Resolution on the Poona Municipality criticised.

37. The Kaiser-i-Hind (86), in its issue of the 22nd March, writes:—The local Government—thanks to its hasty and malignant Resolution, the result of certain caprices of the Secretariat—is likely to experience very soon the moral of that scriptural adage which speaks of sowing the wind and reaping the whirlwind. That Resolution which rebuked in the strongest terms, apparently without any very careful inquiry into or verification of facts, the Poona Municipality for its so-called executive and financial vagaries, is certain to give it a bad half hour and discredit those who misled His Excellency into promulgating it. We were one of the very few who viewed with suspicion from the first the terrible indictment hurled against the Poona Municipality. In this instance, the Government counted without its host. It was not aware that there were in that body certain sturdy spirits, Mr. Chiplunkar specially, who would pulverise that Resolution and expose its authors as the disseminators of reckless and unjustifiable statements. We do not deny that the Poona local self-governing body has its failings. But the failings are more the result of the officiousness of Government than of any laches or negligence on its part. In fact, the Municipality has a head above its shoulders, and knows how to discharge the trust reposed in it. It has been uniformly alive to its responsibilities and has striven its utmost, within the four corners of the Act and the rules and regulations framed under it, to realise them. Such a body is most unlikely to err egregiously and act perfunctorily as its official accusers have tried to make the ignorant public believe. The non-official President, no other than Mr. Dorabji Padamji, is universally well-known not only for his strict integrity but for his great administrative and business capacity. Poona city could not have a better President than him. He is not one who would be so rash and negligent as to allow any lapses, administrative or financial. Poona has the greatest confidence in him and he commands the highest respect. The Municipality could hardly be expected to go astray under his Presidentship. So that we are not surprised if he has now prepared its defence which is certain to overwhelm its accusers. The attack was the wind which the malignant Secretariat witches sowed with a light heart. The defence is the whirlwind which they must be prepared to reap justly and deservedly. Let the Municipality once for all make a strenuous defence from within its impregnable "quadrilateral." Let it fear not. Neither let it tremble lest it should incur the wrath of the men in brief authority at head-quarters. If it has truth on its side, it must eventually put itself right in the eyes of all honest men. For truth must triumph at last and confound its enemies.

The Berar Samachar (3), in its issue of the 23rd March, writes :—The Age of Consent Bill has almost disappointed both the parties. The Select Committee with the exception of Sir R. C. Mitter has treated them with scant courtesy. Every suggestion intended to disarm the Bill of its objectionable parts has been lost sight of. With scrupulous anxiety the Committee records its concurrence with the remarks of the advocates of the Bill, but it has religiously avoided to alter the text of the Bill as far as possible. To set the matters right it has added two amendments which transfer a responsible trust to the hands of the Europeans. The District Magistrates only are empowered to sit in judgment over cases of rape between husband and wife. The Magistrate has the power to sanction an inquiry through Police officers of higher grades. These two amendments have virtually disqualified the Natives to try such cases. Thus the European force and law has secured perfect influence over some topics of social activity. It is no new fact that the Legislative Council is not in touch with the general opinion. Nor does it intend to make a good move as chalked out by reformers who ran to governmental aid to improve their homes. The anomaly of rape between husband and wife is preserved in its entirety. The suggestion to make the guilt of early cohabitation a separate offence has been disregarded. The old law in its advanced stage has not been altered in regard to punishment. In extending the legal protection from unmarried girls to married ones the Government has ruined the child-wives in fits of philanthropy. Allowing married couples to continue to live in the tempting sphere of early union and premature cohabitation the Government has ordered abstinence under the penalty of life-long separation coupled with hard labour and imprisonment of husbands. The separated young wives will have to pay the penalty at the social altar and die the death of helpless wretches if they commit no suicide. The cause of humanity has thus been sacrificed in the mad fury of ultra-philanthropists. We would not digress to point out the glaring defects in the machinery of magistracy and police. The Government wanted to guard the native families from malicious and mischievous prosecutions when they amended the Bill so as to ensure justice through the tribunals of higher grades. But we must confess that we are not sufficiently protected from such untoward circumstances of an unhappy nature. Amongst the high officers who are to administer justice in rape cases ignorance of native life and manners prevails ninety-nine per cent. If malice actuate the hearts of interested parties this ignorance will seal the triumph of uncalled-for and gratuitous prosecutions.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ā) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's administration disapproved.

1. In alluding to the report circulated by the Society papers at home that His Excellency Lord Lansdowne has, on account of his failing health, asked to be relieved of his office, Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 31st March, says:—The public would not be sorry to see His Excellency resign office so soon after its assumption because a general survey of His Lordship's administration shows that the policy pursued by him has not been satisfactory to the public; on the other hand, some of his acts have caused positive dissatisfaction. His Excellency has incurred odium by carrying out in toto the unpopular measures initiated by Lord Dufferin. The failure of an attempt to discredit the confidential memorandum of the Foreign Office shewing designs for the occupation of Gilgit by British troops which was published by a native newspaper, the enactment of a law making penal the publication of Government records without the previous sanction of Government which curtails the liberty of the press, the continuance of the Burmah expedition, the advancement of the so-called defence works on the Afghan frontier, the annual increase in the military expenses of the country, refusal to reduce the duty on salt,—all these measures of his administration are condemnatory of his government. A few good acts have been performed by His Lordship but they are not sufficiently important to induce the public to forget the evil measures noted above and to regret his reported intention of resigning the Viceregal office.

Remarks on the Indian Budget for 1891-92.

2. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 30th March, writes:—With the military expenditure on the increase, the difficulties of exchange staring in the face, a considerable falling off in the traffic receipts from Railways, a tremendous decrease in the revenue from opium, and an increase in civil expenditure due to the census operations and to the restoration of the Famine grant to its original amount of a kror and a half, the Finance Minister finds it no easy task to make the two ends meet, and is unable to propose any remission of taxation. This is a pity. The Financial Statement for this year would, we hoped, appreciably relax the high-pressure system of taxation, which at present obtains in this country, but we have been cruelly disappointed. We must, however, make the best of small mercies and congratulate ourselves on the fact that an era of surpluses has begun, which, it is to be hoped, will continue long and enable Government to place their system of taxation on a better and more equitable footing. We need only note in conclusion that the surpluses of the last two years have rendered material help since it has not been necessary to raise any loan in India in 1890-91, and none is likely to be required in 1891-92. No pledge is, however, given that the Government will not borrow in India during the year. On the whole, the Financial Statement is not discouraging, and let us not be gloomy over it. Such as it is, we welcome it and feel grateful that we have no deficit to moan over, nor the prospect of fresh taxation to complain of.

3. While writing on the same subject, the Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 29th March, observes:—We really see no reason why military expenditure should keep on increasing except that the British rulers of India are becoming more and more unpopular. There is distrust inside and outside, and the work of forcing contentment upon the people as also that of creating a neutral zone round about is vigorously pushed on. This work requires money and Government think it their duty to spend it profusely. But it is exactly in this respect that statesmanship fails. Lord Ripon could reduce military expenditure because he could deepen the feeling of loyalty entertained by the people and was prepared to depend upon it. We are sure if His Excellency Lord Lansdowne does not create a disastrous famine just as Lord Lytton had to face, he will surely leave one in store for his successor. We say create a famine purposely, because we know we never suffer from a famine of water and grain or grass, but we suffer from a want of the means to buy them with, and it is Governors of the Lytton School that are experts in these matters. Except the portion treating of military expenditure the budget statement is dry reading, and we see no necessity for criticising it.

4. The Gujarâti (83), in its issue of the 29th March, writes:—The memorial addressed by Mr. Pherozshah M. Mehta, President of the sixth National Congress, to the Government of India, praying for a remission of the enhanced salt duty, is so able and almost unanswerable a document that we expected it to receive more satisfactory treatment at the hands of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's Government than their Secretary, Mr. Finlay, has been pleased to give it. One of the principal grounds on which the demand for doing away with the extra eight annas is based is that Government distinctly pledged themselves in 1888 to remove this obnoxious tax immediately after the financial position of the country had improved. The explicit utterances of Lord Dufferin and the Honourable Mr. Westland to the effect that Government resorted to additional taxation on an absolute necessity of life under peculiarly special circumstances, leave no justification whatever for the continuance of this harassing tax, when the condition of the finances has materially improved since the salt duty was enhanced. The memorial well points out how consumption has since decreased to less than 10 lbs. per head per annum, while in Europe the average rate of consumption stands at 26 lbs. It also notes the disastrous influence of restricted consumption on cattle necessary for agricultural operations on which the prosperity of the land revenue, the backbone of Indian finance, depends. One is surprised to read the preposterous argument advanced by the Government of India as an answer to the statement made in the memorial that exchange at the lowest may be expected to maintain itself at 1*s.* 5*d.* "Recent quotations, however, show a fall in exchange," says the Secretary to the Government of India, "and the daily quotations have been in the last fortnight more than once below the limit of 1*s.* 5*d.* at which you expect it to be maintained." We certainly expected better financial talent at the head-quarters of the Supreme Government than is found in this line of argument. Surely Mr. Finlay ought to understand that because "in the last fortnight" quotations have been more than once below the limit of 1*s.* 5*d.*, it cannot be inferred by any known logical process or law of fluctuations in exchange that this limit is erroneously fixed. As a matter of fact even Sir David Barbour himself takes exchange at the rate of 1*s.* 5$\frac{1}{32}$d. Is it not absurd then that the Supreme Government should have told the President of the Congress that his forecast was erroneous, simply because it was not in accordance with the indications of a single fortnight? We strongly protest against such a perfunctory and preposterous method of dealing with a public memorial from a weighty and influential body like the Indian National Congress. It is not by arguments like these that the public will ever be induced to ignore the distressing facts that were recently brought to the notice of the Madras Government and the hardships suffered by poor and destitute people in the country. At Arni it was pointed out that even well-to-do rayats found it difficult to supply their farm servants with the salt they needed for their daily food. At Vellore also the same doleful cry was raised. Lord Wenlock could of course do nothing for them. But the Supreme Government ought not to support the continuance of the enhanced salt duty on absurd grounds and further exasperate people who are already dissatisfied with an obnoxious method of filling up an Exchequer, drained away in the interests of a ruinous foreign policy. In course of the discussion on the Protected Age Bill we have had liberal professions of justice and humanity showered upon the country, and if Government desire to escape from a charge of hypocrisy, they ought to seize the earliest opportunity of abolishing a tax which is as unjust as it is oppressive to the destitute millions of India.

Disapproval of the reply given by the Government of India to the memorial of the sixth Indian National Congress for a remission of the enhanced salt duty.

5. In alluding to the correspondence published in St. James's Gazette with a view to reopen the Crawford Case and to secure Mr. Crawford a pension, the Jâme Jamshed (107), in its issue of the 3rd April, says:—Several English papers say that Mr. Crawford was not at fault in the least, and if anything did happen, it was the corrupt Natives employed under him who received bribes in his name. It is easy to put forward such a defence, but the native public will not accept it. It has been proved that Mr. Crawford freely received bribes, and hence it is necessary that an attempt to secure a pension to him should be strongly protested against. The native public expects that Lord Lansdowne and

An attempt to re-open the Crawford Case, disapproved.

Lord Harris being unacquainted with the Crawford Case they will be pleased to keep aloof from the subject.

Disapproval of the creation of the post of Director of Records.

6. The Kaiser-i-Hind (86), in its issue of the 29th March, writes :—Yet another sinecure appointment! This time it is a brand new creation in the interests of British Indian politics and literature. Not satisfied with two scores of Directors-General of every kind and degree, they are having a Director of Records! What his precise duties will be it is not difficult to understand. But why on earth the mere sifting and compilation of State records should require an additional burden on the poor tax-payer? Is it in order that the incumbent may manufacture "to order" what contemporary history should be—that is to say—what contemporary records he should keep and what reject for purposes of the future historian as may best suit the policy of the masters of India for the time being at Calcutta? Is India going to have a true or semitrue official narrative? That is the question. As the administration has been carried on, we have the gravest doubts about the authenticity of many an official report as given in blue-books and parliamentary papers. Look, for instance, at the history of 30 years of the moral and material condition of the country issued by the India Office last year. Is it an absolutely impartial narrative? Or is it that the history of the India of the Queen has been greatly falsified? Let the manufacturer of that blue-book conscientiously answer the question. Meanwhile, we cannot refrain from observing that we view the new office with greatest suspicion, calculated as it is to pervert the judgment of history. Financially, this post will be an additional burden. Has the Government of India forgotten its magniloquent Resolution of five years ago regarding economy and retrenchment? What did it say to the Finance Committee which was appointed as a roving Commission to inquire into the great spending departments of each province? Is it not a fact that one of the orders was to cut down all sinecure offices? Why is it then creating such an useless appointment as that of the Director of Records? Is it a reward for Mr. Forrest's humdrum history of Warren Hastings? He may be a persona grata to the Government of India for whitewashing the sins of omission and commission of that great Governor-General; and His Excellency Lords Lansdowne and Cross are at liberty, being the irresponsible masters of the uncontrolled Indian treasury, to perpetrate a job by finding out a birth for the whitewasher of Hastings. But the public cannot view with equanimity such a job. Government cannot afford to remit the duty on salt, but it seems it can well afford to run up the civil and military expenditure of the empire under one pretence or another! At this rate, they may as well have a Director-General of paste-board and scissors, of broonis and matches, and so forth. We say nothing of the merits of the new incumbent. Bombay knows them too well, though it may suit a contemporary to blow his trumpet, aye, put him on the same pedestal with the brilliant Macaulay. But in the name of the tax-payers we must emphatically protest against this latest job in the sinecure line.

A protest against the appointment of Mr. Forrest as Director of Records at Calcutta.

7. The Jáme Jamshed (107), in its issue of 4th April, says:—When Professor Forrest was employed in the Elphinstone College the students did not appreciate in the least the instruction given by him. The public has a right to ask what need was there for his being sent to Calcutta to open an expensive department. It is said that Mr. Forrest's attempt to prove from the Bombay Government records that Warren Hastings was not guilty of the accusations brought against him had much pleased the authorities who have rewarded him with a post of the annual value of Rs. 20,000. It is also said that this appointment is a job. The Anglo-Indian papers do not raise their voice against this appointment because a countryman of theirs has been benefited. The native press, however, ought to protest against this sinecure.

Reform Bills recommended for India.

8. The Dnyánodaya (12), in its issue of the 2nd April, writes :—Amongst the many Reform Bills that are urgently needed we would suggest a few, which deserve immediate attention, even though we are not sanguine enough to believe that they will receive it. A Bill is wanted to declare that the sale of all intoxicating liquors, foreign or domestic, for the purpose of beverage is illegal, that all liquor-shops ought to be closed, and that liquor-sellers shall be considered criminals in the sight of the law, and their crime visited with heavy penalties. Such a Bill is wanted because liquors are poisons and their use is bringing untold misery upon India. It is degrading its people, it is robbing them of their wealth, it is destroying the happiness of their homes, it is corrupting their morals and ruining their bodies and souls. Hence a Bill is wanted declaring its sale to be a crime, and branding the seller as a criminal. A Bill is also wanted to deal in like manner with opium. To close all shops where it is sold, and to punish those who sell it. In short, a Bill is wanted to condemn as iniquitous the trade that demoralizes mankind, and defaces the divine image that God originally stamped upon man. If in opposition to this we are met with the assertion that Government needs the revenue, we have but to reply that the revenue raised from the demoralization of the people is an unholy revenue, a blot upon the Government that raises it and suicidal to its best interests. Nor is the plea based upon common sense, for a sober and industrious people can yield a far larger revenue than those that have spent their all in poisoning their minds and bodies and destroying their productive abilities. Many a Bill is wanted for the protection and happiness of the women of India. The social laws and customs of Hindu society are framed in the interests of men, and to the thraldom and unhappiness of women, and the Government of India must not forget that one-half its subjects are women. Impartiality must compel it in time to give more heed to this important half of the Indian people. One of the first laws needed is against bigamy. Of course the mere suggestion of such a Bill would raise a great hue and cry, that the Hindu religion was being interfered with, but we must always expect that. No matter how barbarous or inhuman any Indian custom may be there are plenty of texts that can be found in the shástrás to uphold it, and give plausibility to the cry. Bigamy could not be stopped without a cry from the men, but the women would hail it with delight. So also we would like to see some law that would discourage the sale of girls so common in many castes, as though they were so many heads of cattle to be sold to the highest bidder. What can be more unjust than marriage without consent, and influenced on the part of guardians by money considerations? The Age of Consent Bill just passed is good in its way, and is to be thankfully received, but it does not go far enough. Prohibition of marriage below the age of 16 is the very least that the Government of India should do for the women of this country. The widows, of whose miseries we hear much, and would hear more if it were not for the oppression that keeps them dumb, need a little more attention than they have thus far received. Hindu sentiment allows a man to remarry as often as he pleases, but brands a widow with shame who marries again, even though she may have been widowed in merest childhood, and never known the happiness of a married life. For her protection a law is needed. Unwilling mutilation of her person should be severely punished, and that unjust law which deprives a woman of her property inherited from her deceased husband if she marries again should be effaced. A custom prevails here and there of parents marrying their daughters to the idol Khandoba, and compelling them to live thereafter as prostitutes in his temple. Such iniquity deserves the severest punishment that can justly be inflicted. We cannot but think it a disgrace to the English Government that it allows such abominations to go on openly without punishment. What if such iniquities are done in the name of religion, they do not the less deserve punishment, nor are the innocent little girls on that account to fail of being rescued from a life against whose sin and shame they are too young and ignorant to protest. At every mela in honour of Khandoba these iniquitous scenes are to be witnessed, of parents offering their daughters to this vile god, and our paternal Government sees it all without lifting a hand to deliver these poor little ones. We trust this indifference of Government and people is not always to go on! The money-lenders of India can, no doubt, give a very plausible excuse for the exhorbitant rate of interest at which they lend money, but there is no doubt that they have too great liberty allowed them of oppression and extortion, and they know how to use their powers. This class needs the attention of our legislatures. Were their customers their equals in intelligence both might be left to settle their own rights, but their customers are often of the most ignorant classes who are powerless in their hands. The weakness of these illiterate classes is a plea for protection against the high rate of interest and the extortionate methods that money-lenders adopt of squeezing the very last pice from these helpless people, and robbing them of their lands and other property. There are a few of the reforms that need entrance into the social life of the people. If the people ask for them themselves, so much the better, but whether reforms are asked for or not, it is the duty of Government to take them in hand and secure justice, protection and equal rights to all its subjects, male or female, and rid the country so far as it has power of all those social evils that are working for the ruin and degradation of the people. In touching social customs the cry of religion in danger must always be expected, but it should not hinder legislation from the removal of what is unjust or immoral. It should be taken for granted that the best religious feeling will always be on the side of righteous legislation.

9. The Sind Sudhár (157), in its issue of the 21st March, writes:—

The Arms Act and its operation in Sind.

Lists of persons authorised by Government to carry arms are, annually, published in the Sind Official Gazette. On perusing these lists, we find that in every district of this province, the number of persons so exempted from the operations of the Act is but limited. We also find that the majority of the persons enjoying the above privilege belongs more to the rural than to the urban population. The Indian Arms Act forms one of the subjects discussed by the National Congress. At its first two meetings, the Congress resolved that Government should be asked to repeal the Act. But as this resolution was not carried unanimously, it was abandoned, and at subsequent sittings it was held that the law is too strict and requires to be modified and that more persons should be authorised to carry arms. In our opinion, although it is not advisable that the restrictions, imposed by the Act, should be altogether withdrawn, it is but right that the civilized, educated, honest and respectable inhabitants of the towns should not be prohibited from carrying arms.

10. The Prajámat (117), in its issue of the 28th March, has heard that an Assistant Collector when encamped near a village detains females going to fetch water from public wells for the purpose of taking their photos, and keep those in arrest who refuse to be detained. The females of a certain village, adds the paper, are so much terrified that so long as this officer's camp is at their village they do not stir out of doors, and much inconvenience is thereby caused. The Prajámat requests Government to find out this officer and take severe notice of his conduct.

11. A correspondent of the Prajámat (117), in its issue of the 21st March, observes:—Hospital Assistant Bhau, in medical charge of the Ráipur dispensary, Ahmedabad, declines to treat persons who are residents of other parts of the city than Ráipur where there are dispensaries, as also those who happen to request him to change the prescription on account of its failing to produce the desired effect. He makes his subordinates to do his household work during the dispensary hours, and some of them have left the service through disgust. The Hospital Assistant allows his friends and strangers to come and sit near him while attending to the patients who, particularly the females, feel considerable reserve in describing their ailments to him.

Part II.—Legislation.

12. Poona Vaibhav (54), in its issue of the 29th March, observes:—What regard our paternal Government has for public opinion is clear from the fact that it has not adopted the suggestions of even the supporters of the Age of Consent Bill. This disregard, it must be said, is tantamount to a declaration that the British govern India by the sword and do not care for public opinion. The people should now shake off their drowsiness and bear in mind that high Government officers, being true to their salt, will always support the cause of Government, their masters, and mislead the people. These officers should, therefore, never be respected and voted to the chair at public meetings. Government should not consider that they have acted wisely in passing this Bill, for it is beyond doubt that it will bear evil fruit some day or other. It should be distinctly understood that the Hindus are loyal only as long as they are undisturbed, and that they dislike and hate a ruler who disregards their opinion even though he be one of their own race like Bájiráo. When Aurangzeb showed heedlessness to public opinion and interfered with the religion of the people, the great Shiváji appeared on the scene. Similarly, when Bájiráo the Second began to outrage the modesty of ladies in public, the people welcomed the English as their deliverers, but if the latter take to the same course the Hindu god Vishnu will soon assume a fresh incarnation and the people will give preference to dacoits like Umáji Rámoshi, Tantya Bhil and Wásudev Balvant over the British Government. It is unwise to infer from the stillness of the ocean for a time that it will always remain so. Government should, therefore, even now reconsider their situation and give up meddling with things which do not concern them. It is idle to believe that the Government which has harassed the people by increasing the duty on salt, imposing an income-tax and passing legislative measures like the Forest, Abkári and Arms Acts, has passed the Age of Consent Bill in the interests of the people, who have now become aware of the real character of Government and lost all faith in the selfish reformers.

A cartoon on the attitude of Government in passing the Age of Consent Bill.

13. The Arunodaya (21), in its issue of the 29th March, publishes a cartoon in connection with the Age of Consent Act in which India is represented as being about to be blown off from the mouth of a gun by His Excellency Lord Lansdowne who is represented as trampling down the Bengal and other public opinion and having one of his shoes borne on his head by the Honourable Mr. Justice Telang as a mark of gratefulness for passing the Age of Consent Bill.

Comments on a few remarks of His Excellency the Viceroy and Sir Andrew Scoble at the time of passing the Age of Consent Bill.

14. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 29th March, writes:—The Honourable Mover of the Age of Consent Bill, which has now become law, declared that if he were a Hindu, he would prefer to be wrong with Dr. Bhándárkar, Mr. Justice Telang, and Diwán Bahádur Raghunáthráo than be right with Pandit Tarkachudámani and Mr. Tilak. This is a very high compliment to the former batch of gentlemen which they will fully appreciate. But, unfortunately for India, the majority of the Hindus are not as enlightened as Sir Andrew Scoble. When that consummation will be reached, there will be, happily, no occasion for reform by law. The Viceroy, also, publicly thanked all the supporters of the Bill throughout the country. This is, to say the least, a highly novel procedure. We do not remember the Legislature having ever gone out of its way to express its obligations to those who may have supported any particular measure introduced by any individual member. We were up to this time under the delusion, as it now turns out, that the Legislature maintains and is bound to maintain a perfectly impartial position between the opposite views that people may take of any measure introduced by any member. But now we are undeceived. Whenever, in future, any measure is introduced, those who are desirous of winning the public applause of the Legislature through its honoured President,—a very laudable desire, we need not observe,—may support the measure through thick and thin.

A large meeting at Poona to protest against the Age of Consent Act.

15. The Kesari (43), in its issue of the 31st March, says that a large public meeting was held at Poona on the 29th idem under the presidency of Mr. Vishnu Shámji alias Bandu Nána Ránade which was attended by about 10,000 people, Hindus and Mahomedans, and in which a memorial to Parliament protesting against the Age of Consent Act was read and adopted. Mr. Námjoshi, says the paper, in opening the proceedings of the meeting pointed out the necessity for transferring the agitation to England, and was followed by Mr. Tilak who criticized the speeches made in the Viceregal Legislative Council at the time of passing the Bill and showed that

Her Majesty the Queen's Proclamation was misinterpreted and the Act was passed more through false notions of prestige of Government than on a calm and judicious consideration of the subject. Mr. Jinsiwále, Ráo Sáheb Rámnáráyan Amerchand and Moulvi Mahomed also addressed the meeting. A fund was started to meet the expenses of setting up the agitation in England in order to get the Act repealed and Rs. 1,200 were subscribed on the spot. The proceedings were brought to a close after the appointment of a Sub-Committee and a Treasurer, and passing the usual vote of thanks to the Chairman. The Kesari, in conclusion, observes that the people of Poona have done their duty in this matter and hopes that other people will follow suit and try their utmost to prevent the foreign Government from interfering in their social matters.

16. The Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 2nd April, writes:—The public meeting held here on Sunday last in the open ground to the north of the old Shanwár Wáda under the chairmanship of one of the most orthodox gentleman in the city (Mr. Vishnu Shyámji alias Bandu Nána Ránade) to memorialize the British Parliament to disallow the Age of Consent Act was in our opinion as ill-advised as, if not more ill-advised than, the public meeting held on the 1st September 1889 at the Khabutarkhána under the distinguished chairmanship of the Honourable Ráo Bahádur Krishnáji Lakshman Nulkar, C.I.E., to memorialize the Government of India to uphold in its entirety the Bombay Government's ill-advised and as it has turned out to be illegal guarantee to the Mámlatdár witnesses in the Crawford case. So far as the Bombay Presidency is concerned, there was, as we understand the situation, no valid reason for any one to assume any particularly hostile attitude towards the legislative measure. And we further believe that we correctly interpret the general sense when we say that but for the unfortunate controversy started by the Honourable Mr. Justice K. T. Telang, C.I.E., and Dr. Rámkrishna Gopál Bhándárkar, C.I.E., it was not at all unlikely that the subject in question would not have called forth so much opposition in this part of the country as it has done, doubtless in consequence of considerable misapprehension on the subject and also in consequence of a belief, howsoever ill-founded, that the proposed measure, even though it might be quite harmless in its practical results, was the thin end of the wedge. Be that as it may, we are inclined to think that it would be an extremely short-sighted policy to continue the agitation any further even in this country, to say nothing whatever of the desirability or otherwise of transferring the scene of agitation from India to England. Now that the law has been passed, it would, in our opinion, be a graceful act on the part of our countrymen, including even the bitterest opponents of the new measure, to submit to the new law and to render its enforcement unnecessary, and we are inclined to advise in the way we have done, especially because we see no chance whatever of any agitation in England being in any sense successful. We have even grave doubts if any Member of Parliament of established reputation could be prevailed upon to submit to Parliament petition of the character adopted on Sunday last. If the promoters of such meetings were to realize to themselves the ordinary feelings of an Englishman on such a subject, they would doubtless admit the propriety and force of our foregoing observations.

17. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 29th March, writes:—As a matter of experience, it was freely observed in the course of the discussion of the Age of Consent Bill, both in the press and in the Viceroy's Council, that as soon as the Bill was passed the agitation would subside. Therefore, and only therefore, we are now being told by some misguided opponents that in spite of the measure having passed into law, the agitation will be kept up, and perhaps carried over to England. Now, we do not wish for a moment to interfere with the freedom of thought and action of our opponents, as they have so often done with ours. But we cannot help asking if they are actuated by a true Hindu, that is, a truly patriotic spirit? The feeling that underlies this latest development of tactics appears to us to be strangely un-Hindu-like. Apart from that, however, do the opponents expect the slightest sympathy from England towards the perpetuation of a crime which the Legislature has just put down? And who is it that wishes to carry on the agitation? The zamindárs, as a body, know little about such matters, beyond supplying the sinews of war. There must be others at their back, only a few, we hope, to organize these movements. We ask them to pause and consider if they have not done enough harm to the country already? The owners of superfluous wealth in Bengal, who have kept up this excitement, fanned by advocates and brief-holders of sorts, ought to understand that further action may ruin them and their country. We beg to remind these gentlemen of the homely proverb, lene gai puta, kho ái khasam.

Approval expressed of the new Indian Factory Act of 1891.

18. In alluding to despatches from the Secretary of State for India to the Government of India relating to the amendment of the Indian Factory Act of 1879 forwarding a copy of correspondence with the Blackburn Chamber of Commerce upon the subject, the Jáme Jamshed (107), in its issue of the 18th April, says:—The Blackburn Chamber of Commerce recommend that India being a portion of the British Empire the English Factory Acts should be applied to the Indian mills. The selfish nature of this recommendation has been already detected by the Indian authorities who have passed the Indian Factory Amendment Act of 1891; but as there are still nine months before the new law comes into operation, there is a strong probability of the Blackburn Chamber putting further pressure on Lord Cross to assimilate the Indian Factory Act with the English Factory Acts and of the Secretary of State for India succumbing to the influence brought to bear upon him and withholding his sanction to the new Indian Factory Act. It was, therefore, highly desirable that the new law should have been at once brought into operation; but since this has not been done, the Mill-owners' Association should convene a meeting at which it should be declared that the association was quite satisfied with the new law and did not desire any injurious interference with the Indian cotton industry. The Honourable Mr. Nugent has been kind enough to give an indirect hint to the same effect. The Indian mill-hands also should at public meetings express their satisfaction with the new law. There are a few immaterial shortcomings in the new Act, but it is certainly better than the one threatened to be inflicted by the selfish interference of the Manchester cotton manufacturers.

Remarks on the Indian Factory Bill.

19. The Rást Goftár (87), in its issue of the 29th March, writes:—However open to objection the Indian Factory Bill may be in regard to details, it is a measure in which the Government have made an honest attempt to hold the balance fairly between the employers and the employed. We hope that Lancashire will perceive the futility of her agitation, now that Lord Cross has refused to receive a deputation of English manufacturers oppressed with a burning sense of wrong on behalf of their Aryan brethren in distant India. Perhaps, the best thing about the Indian Bill is a day's holiday in the week. Another desirable provision is the raising of the minimum age of children from seven to nine. No human being can object to this change. Employment at the very tender age of seven takes them off from play quite prematurely and is liable to stunt their growth. Female labour is limited to a duration of eleven hours per day with an interval of an hour-and-a half for rest. The Honourable Mr. Nugent spoke with much energy and force against this provision. We agree with him that the eleven hours' limit will drive a large number of women from many of our mills, where their labour is essential to the working of the factories. Nor is it necessary to give them rest for an hour-and-a-half in the middle of the day. The easy-going way in which men and women are accustomed and allowed to work in Indian mills does not necessitate such a prolonged interval of rest. Half-an-hour is sufficient, we think. The Government have fully recognized in the Bill that the conditions of labour in India are quite different from those in England, and consequently they have not given undue weight to the proposals of the Berlin Conference. Mr. Nugent feared that the present Bill might be the precursor of another measure which, while pretending to protect mill-hands, might have the effect of protecting the industry out of existence altogether. But His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's words that the Bill is for the present a final settlement of the question will, we suppose, have a re-assuring effect on those who apprehend that it might be but the proverbial thin end of the wedge.

Part III.—Education.

Disapproval of the appointment of a Deccani Hindu as Curator, Government Central Book Depôt, Bombay, and a Complaint regarding a scarcity of Gujaráti school-books.

20. The Gujardt Darpan (82), in its issue of the 29th March, expresses regret at the appointment of Ráo Sáheb Gopál Balvant Nene, as Curator, Government Central Book Depôt, Bombay, observes that this is the third time that preference has been given to a Deccani Hindu over able Gujaráti Deputy Educational Inspectors in filling this post, and adds that if one of the latter had been appointed to this responsible post, the frequent complaint about a scarcity of Gujaráti school-books, for instance, Hunter's History of India, published by the Educational Department, would not have appeared.

Discontinuance of grant-in-aid to the New English School at Wái, disapproved of.

21. The Mod Vritt (48), in its issue of the 2nd April, complains of injustice alleged to have been done by Mr. Chatfield, Director of Public Instruction, Bombay, by suddenly discontinuing grant-in-aid to the New English School at Wái which, the paper says, has been in good condition, and about which many high Government officers have recorded a good opinion in the school register, and requests Government to inquire into the matter.

Part IV.—Railways.

22. The Rást Goftár (87), in its issue of the 29th March, writes:—While it is deemed necessary to frame laws for the protection of mill-hands, no one seems to think whether it would not be well to afford similar protection to Railway servants. Thousands of persons are employed on the railways in India, and it would not be fruitless to enquire whether the companies are doing all that might fairly be expected of them for the health and comfort of the employés. In the first place, it is important to ascertain whether it is fair or necessary for the working of the railways that there should be different rules of pay and allowances, leave and pension, for European and Native servants. Even in Government service no such galling distinction based purely on racial difference is made. Many of these companies work under a State guarantee. All of them are under some sort of Government control, and it is for the controlling power to see whether the balance is held evenly between European and Native railway employés. There is a strong feeling among Natives that the balance inclines too much in favour of Europeans, that all the higher-paid appointments are regarded as a close preserve for Europeans, and that Europeans are promoted over the heads of their Native superiors for no special qualification save that which they derive from the accident of birth. The railway service should not be divided, as it now virtually is, between European and Native service. This unjust and arbitrary division must be replaced by a division into the higher and lower grade, both being officered by the best men available, be they white, black or brown. The ends of justice will be met if only the highest posts were specially reserved for Europeans. Besides this arbitrary difference of race, the hours of work in some of the railway departments are much too long. From twelve to fourteen hours or more per day is said to be not an unusual duration of work for hundreds of natives in the railway service. These miserable creatures work every day and all day, and from year's end to year's end. No Sunday rest for them. Even without the new Factory Bill, the mill-hands are better off than these poor people. The two gatemen at the Mahálaxmi level-crossing, who were convicted of leaving the gates open while a train passed over the line, have been sent to jail for their negligence. But it was admitted that they were rather the victims of over-work than guilty of any culpable negligence. Their hours of work, night and day, are much too long, and if they occasionally go to sleep over their duty, the fault is not so much of the men as of the system which keeps them at work almost in defiance of nature's demands. Considering the disastrous consequences that may follow any day through the negligence of pointsmen and gatemen, public safety requires that they should be fairly intelligent men and that their hours of work should be so regulated that one may fairly expect from them the most efficient performance of their humble, though most responsible, duty. They may be said to hold the lives of the travelling public in their hands, and therefore they need to be ever wakeful and vigilant.

PART IV.—Native States.

Questions in connection with the catastrophe in Manipur.

23. In alluding to the events reported to have occurred in connection with the catastrophe in Manipur, the Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 2nd April, asks the questions, was Mr. Quinton justified in interfering with an independent Native State like Manipur and carrying matters to such a high pitch? Who had authorized him to take the ruler of an independent State a prisoner? And what need was there for resorting to this extreme step? The paper requests Government to publish timely information on these and similar points.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ā) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Proposal to give a pension to Mr. A. T. Crawford strongly disapproved.

1. In expressing disapproval of the efforts that are being made in England to secure a pension for Mr. A. T. Crawford, the Arunodaya (21), in its issue of the 5th April, observes :—It should be well borne in mind that if the Government of India or the Secretary of State for India sanctioned a pension to a downright dacoit like Mr. Crawford through humanity which they so unwisely exhibited in passing the Age of Consent Bill they would be guilty of giving encouragement to a robber. The Secretary of State should remember that it is not a question of doing good to an individual but one of principle and laying down a precedent. Government should stick to the act of slight justice which they have already done and should not mind the sweet utterances of Mr. Maclean. Before taking any step in the matter Government should consider Native public opinion and the risk which they will run of making themselves unpopular and hated by the people by showing favour to Mr. Crawford in accordance with the recommendation of Mr. Maclean. [Several other papers of the week also run down the proposal to pay Mr. Crawford his costs and a pension.]

Remarks on the claims put forth on behalf of Mr. Crawford for legal expenses or pension.

2. The Gujarâti (83), in its issue of the 5th April, writing on the same subject, remarks :—Mr. Maclean charges the Government itself as a particeps criminis. There is undoubtedly some force in this argument, but it does not establish his client's claim for a pension or for his costs in the case known as Crawford Case. Mr. Maclean himself admits that Mr. Crawford could have been dismissed the service on his own confession as to his indebtedness without further inquiry, and it is strange that Mr. Maclean and others should trouble the Secretary of State for India once more by making demands for costs of the Special Commission on behalf of his client. Mr. Crawford's wife and daughter have been granted a compassionate allowance, and it would be an infamous scandal if the Indian Treasury were to be mulcted in the sum of Rs. 50,000 to satisfy his importunate friends. Those who have read the detailed confession of Hanmantrao and the masterly minute of Sir Raymond West can never be induced to believe that Mr. Crawford was innocent or that the decision of the Commissioners was unimpeachable. Mr. Crawford stealthily left the shores of Bombay without paying even a farthing to his creditors whose claims against him amount nearly to Rs. 1,50,000. A man who attempted to flee away from the country in disguise after having squandered his fortune as well as reputation in a most reckless manner, deserves little sympathy, and if the hearts of Mr. Maclean, "Nemesis" and others of that ilk are overflowing with the milk of human kindness, they had better appeal to the generosity of their friends instead of speaking of mulcting the people of India for a dismissed servant of Government. Again, Mr. Crawford is not so helpless as he is represented to be. He has his son in the Civil Service and a brother in the lucrative solicitor's line, and surely they can never forsake him to the tender mercies of the "City of dreadful Night, cruel London." If Mr. Crawford is innocent, as stated by Mr. Maclean, in the eyes of almost all Anglo-Indians except a few of his personal enemies in the Civil Service, and if he has really been unjustly dealt with by Government, why do they not start a fund in his name? It is very kind of his friends to be generous at the expense of other people's pockets; but if they are serious and honest, let them put their hands into their own pockets. The agitation now set on foot in England is as interested and unfair as that we witnessed in India during the Crawford trial, and we hope the Secretary of State will have courage enough to withstand the entreaties of the friends of Mr. Crawford and refrain from perpetrating another scandal which would be as discreditable as the Crawford scandal itself. It is significant that notwithstanding the feeler put forth by the Times of India in connection with the correspondence, we have noticed it has met with no response from the Anglo-Indian community. The circumstance is fairly indicative of the general feeling on the subject, and if Englishmen are wise, they ought to be the first to discourage the attempts that are now being made to revive a painful controversy that had better be buried in oblivion. The manner in which the controversy was conducted at the time by some Anglo-Indian papers showed how self-interest and racial vanity could blunt the moral sensibilities of persons who flattered themselves with the belief that they were the most enlightened on the surface of the earth, and we should be sorry to witness another pitiful exhibition of that kind in England.

3. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 6th April, writes:—The Honourable Mr. Nugent and the Honourable Mr. Bliss were perfectly right in protesting the other day against the Factories Act passed by the Government of India, as the Bill proposed by Sir Andrew Scoble fourteen months ago was completely modified at the very eleventh hour. It is not difficult to see that Lancashire influence was brought to bear on the Government of India through the Secretary of State, and the decree of the Berlin Labour Conference was secretly pressed on the attention of our Government. The resolutions of the Berlin Conference are scarcely applicable to the conditions of life and labour in this country, and it is to be regretted that Government should have thought fit, on the strength of those resolutions, to interfere with the employment of females in Indian factories. By the new Act they are prohibited night work, and are compulsorily granted a long spell of leisure during the eleven hours they are permitted to work. As Mr. Nugent pointed out, this restriction on female labour will not fail to tell heavily on the condition of our labouring classes. It merely means that bread is taken out of the mouths of so many factory women, who, when ousted from the factory, will have no other paying work left them in this country. Besides restricting the employment of female labour, the Bill as amended by the Select Committee prohibits the employment of children under the age of nine years; further, it provides that no children shall be employed in any factory before five o'clock in the morning and after eight o'clock in the evening, and that they shall not work for more than seven hours in any one day. Further, it is provided that all persons under the age of fourteen shall be considered children and they are to be half-time workers. This is in conformity with the recommendation of the last Factory Commission and cannot be objected to. Mr. Nugent rightly remarked that the conditions attached to the employment of women and children will only lead to "the exclusion of all women and nearly all children from employment in any factory, certainly from employment on moving machinery," for they are sure to be replaced by adult operatives.

Age of Consent Act and Exhortation to the people not to use English cloth until it is repealed.

4. The Poona Vaibhav (54), in its issue of the 5th April, contains a long article, condemning the Age of Consent Act as likely to produce many hardships and much heart-burning among the people, and therefore more unpopular and hated by them than any other law or measure previously passed by Government. It says that though the people of India, knowing as they do that Englishmen at home are more sensible, kind and considerate than Anglo-Indian officers, are not likely to rebel against Government and establish their own rule in the country, they have every right to express their displeasure at the passing of the Age of Consent Act in spite of their opposition, and exhorts all Natives including the Native princes, to make, as some people at Poona have already done, a firm resolution not to use English cloth until the odious Act is repealed by Parliament in the interests of the manufacturers of Lancashire if not out of regard for Indian public opinion.

The Age of Consent Act and its good effect on the Raikwal community of Ahmedabad.

5. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 5th April, writes:—The raising of the age of consent is beginning to bear good results. At a meeting, presided over by Shástri Rámchandra, the Raikwal community of Ahmedabad, which is said to be one of the most learned Bráhman castes, resolved that no girl be married below the age of twelve. It was put forth as an argument against the law holding the husband responsible for the consequences following from the consummation of his marriage with a child-wife under twelve years of age, that, if passed, it would lead to public inquisitions which would give needless annoyance to the people. But there would seem to be no ground for any such fear if other castes, too, come to a similar resolve. Betrothals of girls under twelve may suffice, and after that marriage may be allowed to take place. After the good example set by the Raikwáls of Ahmedabad it ought not to be difficult for men of education belonging to different castes to persuade the people to take a similar wise step.

Rumour about the resignation of Sir Romesh Chander Mitter of his seat in the Viceregal Legislative Council, and remarks thereon.

6. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 5th April, writes:—We learn with regret from the Calcutta papers that Sir Romesh Chunder Mitter has determined to resign, almost immediately, his seat as a Member of the Viceroy's Legislative Council. The reason assigned is that of continued ill-health. We believe that that is not the only reason. No doubt Sir Romesh must have felt bitterly the scandalous manner in which Sir Andrew Scoble and the Viceroy himself in a degree treated him, especially when he was not present in the Council. It was very discourteous, to say the least, on the part of Sir Andrew Scoble to bring against his honoured colleague the charge of dishonesty. But to such a pass had the principal supporters of the Bill been brought by their own recklessness in introducing the Bill that they could justify themselves only by somehow or other damning the opponents. The Statesman pays the following compliment to Sir Romesh: "His thorough mastery of Indian law, his long and wide experience in judicial administration, and his extensive knowledge of the feelings and sentiments of his countrymen, their customs and usages, made Sir Romesh Chunder Mitter's appointment a few months ago a most acceptable one; and his early retirement will, therefore, be regarded as a serious loss to the large community whom he has so ably represented." It is said that in the event of a vacancy occurring by Sir Romesh's retirement Dr. Rash Behary Ghose, a Member of the Bengal Legislative Council, will be invited to fill it. It may be mentioned that this gentleman supported the Age of Consent Bill, and the Viceroy in his concluding speech gave him thanks for the same.

Operation of the Income-tax in India.

7. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 5th April, writes:—The operation of the income-tax in India must be most attentively watched. We fear that the utmost care bestowed by the State will not be able to check abuse of power and arbitrary proceedings by its underlings. Yet it is necessary that some honest attempt be made to lessen highhandedness and corruption. In a country like England, where public opinion is so strong and healthy, this form of taxation is considered full of objections. There the chief grievance is that those who are dishonest can escape it more or less, and those who are most conscientious feel its burden most. It is a premium on dishonesty. Here the grievance assumes another form. Some time ago it was announced that in Bombay the revenue derived from the tax had increased. Notwithstanding this desirable result, we suspect that in this city large sums are paid by the inhabitants that hardly reach the Government treasury. We mean the sums that were not intended to go farther than the pockets of the officials under the Commissioner. A good deal of the revenue must be lost in this manner to the State. It would argue an unbounded faith in human institutions, such as ours in this country are, to suppose that the head office hears all complaints, or that it is competent or capable either to adjudicate fairly on all contested claims. The sympathy of the department is with its own officers. Any over-charge by them is to be taken for granted as correct, unless it is proved to be contrary by overwhelming evidence. An innocent man seeking redress would not always be able to gain his object. The certainty again of failure in getting the injustice redressed, and of the inevitable delay and inconvenience of making the effort, induce many to bear their misfortune in silence. But this is not all. Those who satisfy the departmental officers need not complain. They pay them to secure their good-will. It would be an interesting calculation, whether what Government loses in this way through the corruption of its servants is made up after all, or not, by the total of moneys wrung by unscrupulous assessors from others. It is not easy to say which way the balance lies, in favour of or against Government. In the city itself, the opinion may be hazarded perhaps that the State loses more through its corrupt officers than it gains by the highhandedness of these same or other officers. In the mofussil, we believe, it is exactly the opposite of this. One thing is certain that in small places the tyranny of the Government official is the greatest. Persons who have very little income, even some of those whose means of livelihood are, at the best, precarious, and whose income is hardly more than what is sufficient to supply their wants, are forced to submit to the outrageous demands of the assessor. The Collector who hears the appeals is not always fair-minded. He is in constant dread of permitting by his laxity dishonest persons to cheat the exchequer of its due. He is convinced of the fraudulent intentions of the men that appeal against the assessment of the subordinate officer. He is right so far that the tax-payer would, if he could, evade the payment even when due. But our opinion is that with this dishonest intention, very few, comparatively speaking, succeed in defrauding the Government. Some district officers have hit on an ingenious contrivance to lessen the numbers of those that, dissatisfied with the assessment of their profits of business, might file an appeal against it. We have heard of this expedient being tried some years ago in the Kaira District by the then Collector. It is very simple. It is to make the appellant repent of his hardihood in appealing by deciding that there has been an under-assessment instead of an over-assessment. He departs a sadder, if not a wiser, man. In the district in which it was tried it had the instantaneous effect of the appeals for revision being forthwith withdrawn. It was justice with a vengeance. The pátidárs preferred half a loaf to a quarter. It may be urged that such harsh measures are at times absolutely necessary for the protection of public revenue. There might be occasions when the safe-guarding of public interests—and Government interests in their best sense are public interests—might excuse such an exercise of arbitrary power. But in cases like the present it could have no other effect than confirming acts of petty tyranny by the subordinate official, and causing, who can say, how much heart-burning and distress. In the mofussil, besides, the higher as well as lower grades of officers have the petty ambition of winning the good opinion of their superiors by showing large collections of revenue. The higher officer pats on the back such as are able to collect a larger sum. Some Collectors themselves are not free from this ignoble feeling. Those below them take their cue from them. There is a rivalry—pitiful in one sense, in another pitiless, but always both one and the other—as to who should be able to say that he was from his district able to collect so much of income-tax more than his predecessor or neighbour. The income-tax is, therefore, a fruitful source of injustice and oppression. Occasionally a heart-rending tale comes to the knowledge of the press, is discussed for a time, and forgotten. As a general rule, the sufferers are helpless men, for whom their oppressors are too strong. The majority of the sufferers are exactly those who can ill-afford to part with a small fraction even of their income. It may be sometimes a widow, sometimes a poor cultivator or a petty shop-keeper with a superfluity of children and want of nearly everything else besides. Sometimes, he is one who has seen better days and is now in dilapidated circumstances, who finds it a hard struggle to maintain his respectability, with the Gods and the Fates arrayed against him. From the hands of such persons, whose condition excites pity, the bare means of livelihood are torn by the unscrupulous agents of Government, on the principle that many a little makes a mickle. The means of income and its extent are so difficult to ascertain in various cases, especially where the income is small, the means that the assessor possesses of doing a grave wrong without his being ever brought to account; the little chance that the Government has of being able to hear the collective feeble voice of such as from their position deserve its protection most,—these and several other such causes make a tax on incomes an undesirable one in a country like India. If the Government cannot dispense with it for any period of time, some arragements must be devised for a better protection of its own interests against corruption on one hand, and of the interests, on the other hand, of those classes in particular which suffer most and are at the same time least able to make themselves heard.

Complaint against the A'bkári Department.

8. The Rást Goftár (87), in its issue of the 5th April, writes:—We cannot characterise the policy which the A'bkári Department has persisted in adopting in the matter of the taxation and restrictions on the sale of toddy, as any thing but legalised oppression. For years past the people have groaned under the privations they have suffered for want of toddy; not to speak of the heavy losses sustained by land-holders on account of the thousands of trees rendered useless in each táluka of the Presidency. But Government have not relented. Lord Reay, upon whose attention the matter was pressed from many sides, promised much, but did little, so that people hoped that Lord Harris, who has scrupulously refrained from making large promises of any kind, would do something in the matter. They have been hitherto disappointed. We have reason to believe that the Government of India does not know a tithe of the zulum practised in Bombay under the name of A'bkári reform, and we cannot help blaming the leader of the A'bkári opposition, for not having brought the grievances of the people to the notice of the Supreme Government. We may add that a few years ago the Government of India noticed with disapproval the very heavy taxation of cocoanut trees in the Ratnágiri District, the effect of which has been that the taxation there, though heavy enough in itself, has been lighter than that in the other parts of the Presidency. We trust no time will be lost in making the utmost use of the organization that exists for bringing to the notice of higher authorities this most iniquitous system of repression that ever was countenanced since the British rule began in India. We do not think such a system ever existed in any decently governed Native State before it was introduced into Bombay and then forced upon the Native States against their wishes. Under this system raw toddy has risen from 3 pies to 12 pies per bottle so that 90 per cent. of the very poorest of the poor who consumed toddy, have been deprived of a portion of their daily food. If these poor people could only make their voices heard, the authors of this relentless policy would soon find out their error. But their official complacence has yet been undisturbed. We trust that rigorous efforts will be made to put an end to a state of things which is little short of scandalous.

Protest against the creation of the post of Director of Records and the appointment of Professor Forrest to it.

9. While writing about Professor Forrest's appointment as Director of Records of the Government of India, the Gujarátí (83), in its issue of the 5th April, observes:—We do not know how the Secretary of State sanctioned the new appointment, but there is no doubt that it is a shameful waste of the rayat's money. We, therefore, strongly protest against this creation of another sinecure office, when the poor and destitute have been deprived of even their pinch of salt by resorting to an oppressive form of taxation unknown to any of the Native rulers of India in ancient or modern times. If Government is anxious to proclaim to the world that Warren Hastings was the best of mortals or that Lord Lytton was the best of the Indian Viceroys, it is not necessary to ransack official records for the purpose. It would be preferable to accept these statements at once rather than incur additional burdens. Our people, however, have no voice in the administration of the revenue of the country and they must quietly submit to any disbursements of their money, however scandalous they may be. Since there is a desire in some quarters to provide humdrum mediocrities with fat berths, we may as well ask Government to appoint a Director-General of Humbugdom. Governments, like Cæsar's wife, should be above suspicion, and one is ashamed to find our enlightened Government scandalously wasting their resources as they have done in the present instance by the creation of a post the necessity for which exists only in the imaginations of one or two interested journalists and their friends.

The construction of piers at the small ports on the sea-coast in the jurisdiction of the Bombay Presidency recommended.

10. The Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 8th April, says that His Excellency the Governor on his way to Mahabaleshvar having visited Alibág, Ratnágiri and other sea-coast towns, has personally witnessed the inconveniences suffered by passengers in embarking or landing in the absence of piers at the various ports on the line, that for the safety of the lives and property of the numerous passengers on this coast line the early construction of quays is urgently needed, but that these small ports being unable to incur the heavy expenditure needed for the wharfs, the necessary improvements ought to be provided for from the Imperial treasury, and that it is to be hoped that Lord Harris will readily make the necessary provision for the urgently needed works.

11. The Din Bandhu (10), in its issue of the 5th April, writes:—We think Mr. Richardson the sub pro-tem. Third Presidency Magistrate's time is nearly up, and Government will have to decide soon whether he should be confirmed or not. If Government have any regard for public opinion and wish to expedite the disposal of criminal work in Bombay we may be pardoned for suggesting to them to take this opportunity to put in Mr. Richardson's place a smart gentleman of good legal training who is not hard of hearing. It is a mistake, we think, to appoint superannuated Government officials from the mofussil to discharge active Magisterial duties in presidency towns like Bombay. Mr. Richardson may be a very able Revenue officer, but as a Magistrate he has failed to satisfy the public here. We trust Government will not turn a deaf ear to public opinion this time.

Appointment of a smart gentleman of good legal training in place of Mr. Richardson, Third Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, recommended.

12. The Prajámat (117), in its issue of the 4th April, observes:—In the absence of Ráo Sáheb Gopálshankar, Mámlatdár of Táluka Viramgám, who has been deputed to audit the accounts of the Mahi Kántha and Pálanpur Agencies, Ráo Sáheb Gopálji Gulábbhái was appointed in his place, but during the short time he was there he made himself unpopular, and we request the authorities to make an inquiry into the cause of his unpopularity. Ráo Sáheb Gopálshankar is a very able and experienced officer and deserves to be promoted in recognition of the high ability with which he is performing the special duty. Government ought to consider his case on the retirement of Ráo Bahádur Chunilál Venilál, District Deputy Collector, Broach.

A recommendation about Ráo Sáheb Gopálshankar, Mámlatdár of Viramgám.

13. The Nyáyadarshak (115), in its issue of the 6th April, observes:—Some Government officers put litigants and witnesses, particularly those coming from out-stations, to great inconvenience by not punctually attending their Courts, as was done on the 1st instant by the First Class Subordinate Judge, Ahmedabad, who kept the litigants and their witnesses waiting for him from 10-30 A.M. till 4-45 P.M., though the summons asked them as usual to be present in Court at the former hour. If the Subordinate Judge was suddenly unavoidably prevented from attending the Court in time he should have arranged to allow the parties to return home that day postponing their cases to some other convenient day. Such perfunctory habit of officials ought to be duly taken notice of.

A complaint that the First Class Subordinate Judge, Ahmedabad, does not attend his Court punctually.

14. The Jáme Jamshed (107), in its issue of the 11th April, says:—This years' list of Special and Common Jurors is as defective as its predecessors. The list unnecessarily contains 2,028 names half of which may well be omitted. The Criminal Sessions of the High Court are held five times in a year, and 250 special jurors and 750 common jurors will be quite enough to answer the requisite needs. One cannot see from this list the principle on which gentlemen are selected for the Special Jury and the Common Jury, and it would be well to declare once for all the principle on which the selection ought to be made. In the list recently published the secretaries of some cotton spinning mills are entered as special jurors, while those of others are put down as common jurors. The assistants in some mercantile firms are made special jurors while the partners of other firms are classified as common jurors. If the Clerk of the Crown who prepares this list annually is given a committee composed of an experienced gentleman from each of the several communities, to assist him in his work, the list will be undoubtedly more satisfactory than it has hitherto been.

The new list of Special and Common Jurors found fault with.

15. The same newspaper (107), in its issue of 9th April, says:—It is gratifying that the attention of the Police of Bombay has been drawn to the indecent songs sung at the performances in some of the local theatres, the evil having run its course for some time. It is, however, rumoured that still more horrible immoralities are being practiced behind the theatrical curtains, and this rumour ought to draw the attention of the Commissioner of Police. The reports that have reached the Jáme Jamshed about the unnatural crimes that are committed there are so horrible that they cannot be published in a newspaper. These crimes are punishable under the Penal Code and cognizable by the police. If the proprietors of dramatic corps are held responsible for the protection and conduct of boys in their service, visiting them with a deprivation of their licenses for appearing on public boards for six months or more for a dereliction of their duty, the immoralities will be materially checked.

Alleged illegal conduct of the Rájkot Police.

16. The Káthiáwár Times (3), in its issue of the 4th April, writes:—It is reported that the local police require the residents of the civil station to take all persons who may be their guests to the Police Chief Constable, both on their arrival and departure. It is not known how far this is correct, but if correct, it may be worth while to enquire under what authority this is being done. In the case of persons of doubtful character such a course might be expedient, but to put citizens and thieves on the same level is not only queer but positively objectionable. The authorities might well inquire into this matter, for it is not only repugnant but highly inconvenient to all persons to be thus dragged about instead of being left to their peaceful avocations.

Part II.—Education.

Grant-in-aid to private English schools.

17. In noticing the statement made in the annual report for 1890 of the New English School at Surat, a private institution, that the number of the students having increased during the year an application was made to Government for a grant-in-aid, and a reply was received from the Educational authorities declining to make the grant unless the small tuition fee charged by the institution was raised to the same amount as is exacted at the Government High Schools, the Jáme Jamshed (107), in its issue of the 6th April, says:—This statement is not new, because a similar reply was said to have been given to a private school at Ahmedabad that had applied for a grant-in-aid. But enquiries should be made as to what has become of the acceptance by Government of the recommendation made by the Education Commission presided over by Sir William Hunter that as regards middle education private enterprise should be encouraged and fostered. The reply received by the Surat English School betokens a narrow-minded policy on the part of Government when it is quite plain that success of private enterprise in this direction is certain to relieve the public treasury of an appreciable burden of the educational grant. An authoritative explanation ought to be forthcoming to show the object of requiring private institutions to raise the tuition fee in order to entitle them to a grant-in-aid from Government.

Part III.—Municipalities.

The Bombay Government and the Poona Municipality.

18. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 5th April, writes:—The Bombay dailies published a Resolution of Government embodying their reply to the letter of the President of the Poona Municipality praying that the corporation be supplied with copies of the papers on which the Resolution of January last was based. From this Resolution it appears that Government are ready to give a hearing to the Municipality and have complied with their request asking for papers. It also appears from the Resolution that in spite of the mischief done by the representations of the then Collector Mr. East prompted by Mr. Joglekar, Government continue to have confidence in the experience and ability of the Corporation. It also appears that Government have kept their mind open, and should the representation of the Municipality be as solid and weighty in fact as the Municipality hopes it will be, Government as unbiassed judges will reconsider the case and dispose of it in a just manner. Government however appears to be still labouring under one misconception, viz., that the Municipality did not avail itself of the opportunity afforded to it by the Collector of offering an explanation. The fact is that the Collector did not even so much as inform the Municipality as to what had transpired at the inquiry which Mr. Plunkett held with closed doors, and inasmuch as the report of the Collector and the Resolution of Government lean for their support on the results of the inquiry, it is incorrect to say that the Municipality was given an opportunity. Mr. East was in such haste to condemn the body that he did not even inquire as to what action the Municipality had taken on Ráo Bahádur Joglekar's letter. He at once took into his head the idea of penning a strong memorandum most discourteously worded and threatening the Municipality with an unfavourable report to Government. The Municipality considered Mr. Joglekar's letter, and inasmuch as the Collector had already made it the subject of a memorandum forwarded the result of their deliberations to the Collector. A confidentially conducted inquiry was at once ordered to be held and Mr. Plunkett proceeded to prepare the long rope with which the Municipality was to be hung. Mr. East alone knows under what Act this closed-door inquiry could be held, an inquiry instituted with the express object of condemning the work of a corporate body the members of which claim as much respect as either the Collector or the City Magistrate for honesty and public service;—an inquiry by a Municipal Commissioner into the conduct of the whole body; an inquiry, be it further remembered, helped by the accusers themselves. Mr. Plunkett, we venture to say, could have remonstrated, but did nothing like it. He could at least have ordered the accusers of the corporation to have nothing to do with it. But his goodness was his fault. We hope, in its representation now to be submitted, the Municipality will make it a special point to bring to the notice of Government the utterly unjust position which Mr. Plunkett was made to occupy, not only in the unjust and illegal inquiry, but also as City Magistrate. It is he who is really Government in this matter. We know he makes reports, and as is generally the case, his reports form the basis of the report of the Collector, and so on. The Municipality does not know what mischief is brewing until a Government Resolution is received. There can be nothing so objectionable. Would it be right, or just, if a Member of Council were asked by the Government of India to act as a spy and to report as to how Government was being carried on, and the Government of India acting upon his information were to call upon the local Government to explain or to justify a Resolution? Would this not be most unconstitutional, most unjust and most questionable? We think a judicial mind like that of Sir Raymond West would make this one fact the strongest ground for condemning the conduct of Mr. East.

19. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 6th April, writes:—The Government has issued a fresh Resolution on the subject of the accusations made against the City Municipality of Poona. After the full explanation supplied by the President's letters it was to be expected that Government would revise its former judgment, moderate its tone of censure, and make some reparation for the hasty condemnation it passed upon the Municipality. The Resolution just issued shows, however, that Government is in no mood to be mollified yet. It adheres to its reproving tone, finds fault with the Municipality for not placing the information in its possession before Government earlier, and calls upon the Municipality to submit a scheme about the appointment of an executive officer within a given time. There is not a word about whether Government has altered its judgment as to the charges previously made in view of the information now forthcoming. We think it is hardly fair to the Municipality thus to let the charges remain unreversed when subsequent explanation shows sufficient reason for reversing them. The Government somewhat guilds the pill by paying a compliment to the Municipality for its "wide experience in municipal affairs" and asking it to frame a scheme of municipal government which would be useful to all district municipalities. In this particular the attitude of the Government shows an agreeable contrast to that of the Commissioner, C. D., who advises the Government to disregard the Municipality altogether, and to get the Collector of Poona to frame a scheme consulting the Municipality at his discretion. The proposal to appoint a strong, capable executive officer to the Poona Municipality is, as we have often said before, a good one. The Municipality itself approves of it, and Government has taken it up so seriously that it has resolved to appoint a Committee to consider the question at Poona during the next rains. The question is proposed to be considered comprehensively with reference to all district municipalities, and it is further proposed to amend the District Municipal Act of 1884 in accordance with the Committee's recommendations. It is indeed highly desirable that the executive and deliberative functions in the district municipal administration should be separated as they are in the Bombay City. The Bombay Municipality is a large concern and its constitution is elaborate. The elaborate machinery of Bombay will not suit in its entirety the district municipalities, but a miniature constitution on the same lines may well be framed to answer the purpose. Let us hope the Committee that is to sit at Poona during the rains will be armed with plenary powers of enquiry, and that their labours will be extended to all branches of district municipal administration quite as much as to the constitution. There is one point which we should like specially to be considered. having regard to recent experience, viz., the capacity and the statutory liability of Municipal Boards to bear the cost of primary education. We have reason to fear that primary education has much suffered by the transfer of the liability and that however justifiable in principle, such transfer is not desirable until the municipalities are in a better financial position. We know very well what a hard battle education has to fight for its existence in the Bombay Municipality, wealthy as it is. In the mofussil likewise there are reports of school-masters' pay being left in arrears for months, and the schools being neglected and starved. This is a great calamity, and ought to be averted, whatever deviation from theoretical principles may be involved in doing so.

20. A correspondent writing over the signature "X" to the Mod Vritta (48), in its issue of the 9th April, while criticising a reply sent by the President of the Wái Municipality in the District of Sátára to a communication from certain members of the same corporation in the matter of certain expenditure by the municipal clerk and disrespect shown to those members in the municipal office, disapproves of the tone of the President's reply, says that since the appointment of the present President municipal affairs having been managed in a negligent, partial and illegal manner, several Municipal Commissioners have been disappointed, and that no improvement has been effected except that the questionable mode of transacting business by means of circulars instead of holding meetings has been introduced. The correspondent expresses dissatisfaction at the President not having taken sufficiently severe notice of the fault of the clerk pointed out by the Municipal Commissioners, and fears that on account of the relationship existing between the President and the Reporter to Government adverse comments on the municipal matters stand little chance of being brought to the notice of Government.

PART IV.—Native States.

The Government of India found fault with in connection with the rising in Manipur.

21. In noticing the account published by the Pioneer of the 5th instant of the events that led to the rising in Manipur, the Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issues of the 6th and 7th April, says :—Mr. Quinton was instructed by the Government of India to recognize Kulu Chandra Sing as Mahárája on condition that his brother the Senápati or Commander-in-Chief and Jubráj or heir-apparent should be deported. These instructions seem quite strange in the case of an independent ruler like the Mahárája of Manipur. The proper course was that the Mahárája should have been called upon to deport his brother, and by failing to take it the Government of India has placed itself and Mr. Quinton in a false position that deserves to be much regretted. To make matters worse weakness or negligence was shown by the officers under Mr. Quinton. If reliable information about the temper and strength of the Manipuris had been secured it would have proved of much service, but neither Mr. Grimwood, the Political Resident at Manipur, whose duty it was to obtain such information, nor Colonel Skene, who was deputed with 250 Goorkhas to arrest the Commander-in-Chief, possessed it, and they deserve censure for failing in the proper performance of their important duty.

22. Kaiser-i-Hind (86), in its issue of the 5th April, writes:—We have no doubt that the "glorious" British arms will assert their authority and restore the high prestige of the Administration by bringing the Manipuris to book. But we may inquire what led to the mission of Mr. Quinton to these wild and inhospitable regions? Why on earth is the Government of India perpetually interfering in the internecine strifes of petty Chiefs on the border? As a matter of fact it has known from the previous history of the Manipur State for over a century that it is scarcely worth the while of the Government to put its finger in the small pies which its Chiefs are making and unmaking. If the Rájah dethroned was a fakir Rájah who did not care to govern the State, where was the expediency of again putting him on the gádi? But if there be some reason of State which impelled the Government to put him there, the public has a right to know what it is. Meanwhile what may be the object of Mr. Quinton's mission can only be guessed. Securely seated on the gádi, the present occupant thought he was strong enough to refuse British demands and defy the Government. If these surmises be correct, then it would seem that the Government of India has been rightly served; for we have no sympathy absolutely with its disastrous foreign policy. The Manipur catastrophe must have a history behind it which we may never know until perhaps the newly created "Director of Records" is ordered to give us a glimpse of it some years hence!

Mr. Quinton's mission to Manipur, disapproved.

23. The Jáme Jamshed (107), in its issue of the 9th April, observes that among the Calcutta Volunteers who volunteered and have been permitted by Government to go on active service in Manipur, there are several individuals who are rich or draw high salaries, that if any casualties occur among them large compensations will have to be paid to their families, and that hence it is better not to send these volunteers to the front.

Despatch of Calcutta Volunteers on active service in Manipur, disapproved.

24. In giving a short account of the recent disturbance at Manipur, the Arunodaya (21), in its issue of the 5th April, shows sympathy with the Manipuris by acquitting them of culpability and censuring the British Government and its officers for meddling with other people's concerns, regrets want of warlike spirit in the present generation of the Indian people and expresses a hope that the Manipuris having regard to the strength and greatness of the British Government will cease hostility with it.

The recent disturbance at Manipur.

25. The Gujaráti (83), in its issue of the 5th April, regrets that India will have to incur the cost of the approaching war with Manipur, thinks that Sir David Barbour was aware of the coming hostilities when he prepared the recent Budget Estimate, since he has provided a large amount under the head of military expenditure, condemns the warlike policy of Government, and says that information received up to date shows that the fault lies with the British Government while the Mahárája of Manipur deserves no blame.

Remarks in connection with the outbreak at Manipur.

26. The Rájyabhakt (118), in its issue of the 7th April, says:—Government should not have interfered in the family feuds at Manipur. The rising in that State might prove as serious as the late Afghan war. Several acts of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's administration have made him unpopular, but if he wishes to win the favour of the people he must respect public opinion.

27. The Ahmedabad Times (90), in its issue of the 8th April, observes:—If Mr. Grimwood, the Political Agent at Manipur, had assisted the ex-Mahárája in regaining his kingdom soon after his dethronement the consequences would not have been so serious. An enquiry ought to be made why this was not done. Political Agents generally treat Native Chiefs very harshly and Government ought to keep a strict watch on their conduct and see that the Chiefs are respected.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Akbar, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

His Excellency Lord Harris as an administrator.

1. The Kdthidwdr Times (3), in its issue of the 14th April, writes:—Lord Reay sometimes made queer appointments. But we are glad to note that His Excellency Lord Harris is more careful in his selection of officials for responsible posts. Still there is room for improvement in this direction, and unless His Excellency pays greater attention to this part of his duty he can hardly hope to see the desired improvement in the departments under him. The characteristic features of Lord Harris' Government are his candour to deal equally by all and his zeal to remove public grievances. His Excellency knows well where to administer a snub and where to put in a good word. He is as chary of the one as of the other. He gives praise where praise is due, but he does not make a lavish use of it. Judging from his past year's administration Lord Harris is likely to prove a very efficient administrator. He has acquitted himself remarkably well, much more creditably than the public expected. Besides skilfulness in public speaking which is so essential to make a Government morally strong, and in inquiring into all matters of public interest, he brings to bear upon official routine work much businesslike ability, sound sagacity, and practical experience. He understands his business thoroughly, avoids arbitrary methods, and expects the heads of departments and other officials to exercise their judgment and sense of right. While keeping in touch with public opinion and current affairs there is scarcely any question of importance that escapes his notice. He subjects officials to competent criticism and requires them to explain from time to time what they are doing and what reason (if any) they have for doing it. With a little more improvement in the direction pointed out Lord Harris' administration must prove very successful.

2. The Mahratta (4), in its issue of the 12th April, writes:—There can be no two opinions now about His Excellency Lord Harris' earnestness of purpose in discharging the onerous task thrown upon him. His recent tour is an instance in point. Whereas former Governors used to run up to the hills as soon as March had fairly advanced, our present Governor does not go to Mahábaleshvar till towards the end of April, and he is using the time thus saved from a life of dissipation at Mahábaleshvar in moving about from one district to another and making himself acquainted with the wants and wishes of the people over whom he has been sent by Providence to rule. For this we thank His Lordship. The recent Resolution on the affairs of our Municipality shows how ready His Excellency is to correct an error into which he might be hurried by the misrepresentations and one-sided reports of officials.

Condemnation of the decision of Parliament to abolish the Indian Opium Trade.

3. The Jáme Jamshed (84), in its issue of the 14th April, says:—The decision of Parliament on the motion brought forward by Sir John Pease, requiring the Government of India to abolish the poppy cultivation in India, is astounding. The House of Commons, about whom we always wish to speak respectfully, have in this instance permitted their missionary zeal to get the better of their discretion. The result of the decision in the present financial condition of India will be disastrous. England as a nation will lose by it if it is enforced, while India will be exposed to national ruin. All that is required to paralyze the efforts of the Government of India to maintain peace, progress and good Government in the country is to allow exchange to run down to fifteen or fourteen pence per rupee and to take away the six or seven krors of opium revenue, and the work of India's enemies will be completed even beyond the holy wishes and religious zeal of Exeter Hall. The clear duty of the Government of India is therefore to enforce a hearing for itself in Parliament, and to place its resignation on the issue of the debate. If it is convinced that it cannot reasonably govern the country under the terms of the resolution of Sir Joseph Pease it should manfully say so in plain English. The people of India will on such an occasion unite as one man in support of the Government and will give utterance to its wishes and convictions in no uncertain tone. The occasion is to them a matter of life and death, and divided opinion on this question has no existence. At present there is absolutely no proof that opium is exercising a pernicious and demoralising influence either in India or in China. The best available evidence for the elucidation of the question is to be found in India, and it has been upheld, and with great show of reason, that the opium which is used by the people of India, whether adults or children, is used as a nerve sedative and a prophylactic. No extensive tables have yet been formed as to the effect produced on human life by the use of opium, but there is a very widespread opinion that the use of opium prolongs life. This opinion is freely shared in by the natives of this country and will be confirmed by reference to numbers of existing opium-users who have reached advanced ages. And when it is remembered that the natives of India enjoy no nerve stimulant except tobacco, opium or alcohol becomes a seeming necessity of advanced life. Placed between these two classes of stimulants, the preference that is given to opium over alcohol is doubtless the wisest choice that could be made. All the dangers and bad consequences which are said to arise from an abuse of opium apply with greater force to the use of alcohol, and yet Sir Joseph Pease and his party wink at the latter! [The Bombay Samáchár (93) and the Akhbáre Sodágar (91), in their issues of the same date, express similar sentiments. The Jáme Jamshed, in its issue of the 16th idem, is glad to learn that Government will take no action on the vote taken on Sir J. Pease's motion for the suppression of the opium trade, and hopes that on a resubmission of the question Parliament will find it impracticable to carry out the decision about the abolition of the trade on account of the peculiar circumstances of the Indian finance. The Bombay Samáchár, of the same date, severely censures the Conservative Ministry for failing to place before Parliament the actual circumstances attending the Indian opium revenue and allowing Parliament to pass the decision for the abolition of the opium trade.]

Local attempts for the abolition of the opium traffic in India, disapproved.

4. The Bombay Samáchár (93), which has been ever opposing the attempts made in England for the suppression of opium traffic in India, in its issue of the 13th April, after once more briefly explaining the heavy loss that would befall the Indian Exchequer in the event of the opium revenue being abolished without any compensating advantages following from the abolition, expresses satisfaction at the fact that the mass meeting held on the 10th instant in the Frámji Káwasji Institute to get up a movement in aid of the suppression of the Indian opium trade was not a very large one, as very few Natives, except some school-boys, attended it, and advises the Natives not to join the anti-opium alliance, which the meeting has started. [The Jáme Jamshed (84), in its issue of the same date, expresses similar sentiments.]

5. The Jáme Jamshed (84), in its issue of the 14th April, says:—Dr. Milne the Bishop of Bombay's taking the chair at a mass meeting held on Friday last to protest against the Indian opium traffic raises the question whether the order of the Government of India prohibiting Government officials from taking a part in political movements is applicable to His Lordship. The work done by the Indian National Congress has been in the real interests of the country, and if Government servants are prohibited from taking even a slight part in the movement, how much more desirable is it that European officials should be warned against interesting themselves in movements like the one seeking to abolish the Indian opium traffic? It is worth knowing, whether the above-mentioned Government order has been infringed by the Lord Bishop. If not, why should the Native servants of Government be precluded from taking part in the Congress movement? It is to be hoped that an explanation on the subject will be forthcoming from the Government of India.

Comparison between the British Indian and the Goa Governments.

6. A correspondent writing to the Indu Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 13th April, institutes a comparison between the British Indian Government and the Goa Government, and arrives, at the conclusion that the subjects of the former are not so happy as those of the latter. The correspondent refers to the general disarming of the British Indian subjects and to their consequent subjection to ill-treatment at the hands of unruly roving tribes like the Beluchees, and says that the subjects of the Goa Government not being disarmed have nothing to fear from the Beluchees who are said to have made such havoc in British territory. In the Goa territory, adds the correspondent, though there is no prohibition for carrying arms the proportion of crime is not so large as in British India. There the people do not have recourse to law courts for remedy against every petty offence but depend upon their right of self-defence.

Disapproval of the proposal to give a pension to Mr. Arthur Crawford.

7. The same newspaper writes:—We had thought the name of Mr. Arthur Travers Crawford was too much discredited even in England for any one to seriously propose that a pension should be given to him, but we find we are grievously mistaken. There is no limit to the blindness which ties of personal friendship or pride of race may cause, and where such blindness is predominant all considerations of prudence, morality or justice are cast to the winds. No man in living memory has done so much harm, morally speaking, to the good name and prestige of the British Government on this side of India, as Mr. Arthur Crawford. He was an imposing dazzling personality, and his ability and urbanity cast a glamour over his misdoings though they were a matter of common talk. His surpassing ability covered all his faults, and he was emboldened in his ways of vice by the absolute immunity from detection he enjoyed. The demoralization he had caused in the service and the public at large by his open defiance of all public morality, the systematic practice of taking black-mail he had established, and the unscrupulous use he made of his power and position, are matters too fresh to be easily forgotten. His acquittal on the graver charges by the Commission and by Lord Cross is a public scandal which has done incalculable harm in public estimation to the good name of England as a dispenser of justice. The public of India, the entire public, official and non-official, Native and European, with the exception of a few personal friends has accepted the verdict passed by the Government of Bombay as the true one, and has reconciled itself to the decision of the Secretary of State seeing that Mr. Crawford has after all been dismissed the service. That such a discredited man should be held up as a fit object for pension is the height of moral depravity, and if the Government should by any means be induced to grant the prayer, we conceive it would be almost a greater scandal than his acquittal. It is argued on his behalf that as he has been acquitted on charges of bribery and corruption he is entitled to get his pension, and, we presume, the costs of his defence too. We say, for one thing the acquittal was no acquittal in the true sense of the word. A perverse opinion, which, be it remembered, was not under the Act a competent judgment but an opinion only, was expressed by the Commissioners against all the evidence. The Bombay Government which was the true Judge constituted by the Act held that that opinion was wrong, and recorded a verdict of guilty on all counts. The Secretary of State in a weak way subordinated his own better judgment and adopted the opinion expressed by the Commissioners. But the very weak way in which this was done was itself a condemnation, and by no means a triumph on which Mr. Crawford or his friends could crow over. In any case the verdict on the charge of indebtedness is unanimous, and that was, for an officer of Mr. Crawford's position, a by no means a venial offence. He broke the departmental law, a breach for which any of his subordinates would have been punished with equal severity, and the penalty of dismissal provided by the law was visited upon him as the least severe that could be passed. To grant him a pension now would be a reversal of that order of dismissal. Pension is, we believe, a reward for honourable service. An officer dismissed for misbehaviour in the service could not be said to have had an honourable service. The grant of a pension and Lord Cross' order of dismissal could not therefore stand together, and for the honour of the British Government we trust there will be no reversal of an order which was the barest justice done by them and the least reparation made to the offended public opinion of this Presidency. Whatever the personal friends of Mr. Crawford may say or do, we hope the Secretary of State in Council and the Government of India will be firm. The British public too and the Members of Parliament must endeavour to rightly understand the issue involved, and to guard themselves against being carried away by personal sentiment. Let us once more warn Government that the acquittal of Mr. Crawford has given a severe shock to public susceptibilities and that if a pension be granted to him the Government will entirely lose the esteem and confidence of the people. We protest so strongly because we feel strongly that the tax-payers of this country should not be saddled with an unjust pension. They have had already to pay a heavy penalty in the exactions Mr. Crawford made and in the costs incurred in bringing him to justice. But a higher consideration is the good name of the Government and the claims of justice, and we earnestly hope that nothing so iniquitous as the grant of a pension to Mr. Crawford will be perpetrated.

Mr. A. T. Crawford may be granted a subsistence allowance.

8. The Phœnix (5), in its issue of the 11th April, writes:—We find that what Mr. Maclean pressed upon the Secretary of State was not a pension for Mr. Crawford but a subsistence allowance and the payment of the large expense he had incurred in connection with his trial. This makes the case somewhat different. The Government of India has refused to pay Mr. Crawford's expenses on the ground that it was his own conduct that made the trial necessary. But there cannot be much objection to his being allowed a subsistence allowance. His wife and daughter have been granted such an allowance and the Secretary of State may well extend his generosity a little further.

A recommendation to Government to confer honours upon the leading Mahomedan gentlemen.

9. A Mahomedan correspondent writing to the Kaiser-i-Hind (85), in its issue of the 12th April, observes:—It is an old complaint that honours are bestowed mostly on Government servants, only a few being assigned to such non-officials as have strong interest at head-quarters. The Mahomedan community is, as a rule, neglected in this matter. A few names may therefore well be recommended in anticipation of the Birth-day Gazette, viz., those of Messrs. Karimbhái Ibráhim, A'damji Pirbhái, Badrudin Tayabji and Kamu Suleman, who are the leaders of their respective sects and whose charities are well-known. The Mahomedan community in general would feel gratified if some honour or other were conferred upon these gentlemen.

Reasons why the agitation against the Age of Consent Act is to be continued and carried to England.

10. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 12th April, writes:—We are very sensitive and we feel nothing so much as an attack on our national character. That the Age of Consent Act will write in the statute-book the character of the Indian nation in blackest letters is our grievance, and so long as this certificate of bad character remains on the statute-book we can enjoy no peace, no rest. It is with a view to bring to the notice of the character-loving English public an act of the grossest national injustice that we want to carry the agitation to England. Not a single Member of the Viceroy's Council could speak of the existence of the evil in provinces other than Bengal, and yet their statute-book would be made to speak otherwise. The whole public of Bengal is speaking and showing to demonstration and yet Government would rely upon the words of a handful of persons and condemn the province. It would be a very sad confession of the disastrous effects of the British rule in India to say that a nation so renowned in history has so far lost its national character that it can bear to be permanently stigmatised as a nation of brutes and savages, and if the effects of British rule have really been so disastrous let us make England aware of it so that it may never expect to rely upon us for its strength, and never boast of its having civilised us, and India may no longer be looked upon as a gem in Her Majesty's glorious diadem. But no. We refuse to take this verdict. The existence of the vice is in the first place taken for granted; then, as the Honourable Mr. Hutchins has told us, the vice is converted into a crime and the Indian Penal Code is amended in such a way that it may declare the whole Indian nation as a nation of criminals. Can there be any greater insult to the dignity of a nation? Honourable Members themselves are our witnesses. They have themselves stated that all the religions in the land agree in condemning immature cohabitation. They themselves admit that the Indian nation as a whole is sensitively religious and yet are of opinion that the evil practice complained of is of such general prevalence that it requires a legislative remedy! Who would have the hardihood to deny that this is blowing hot and cold at the same time? Our third reason for opposing and continuing to oppose the measure is the conduct of the Government of India in contracting the scope and effect of the Proclamation. The interpretation now put upon it is a distinct violation of a sacred charter. The Honourable Mr. Nulkar cites instances in which the Government of India legislated against the wishes of the nation. These instances, we say, speak the history and origin of the Proclamation. That charter was given to the people as a weapon of defence against the wanton conduct of a despotic Government uncontrolled and unchecked by public opinion. The Hindu and Mahomedan religions owe their existence to the Proclamation, or the Brahmos and Missionaries would have swept them out of existence long ago. We read the speeches in the Council with the greatest surprise, but to go through Ráo Bahádur Nulkar's speech was most painful work. He chose to misread, to misrepresent, and, above all, to show sufficient respect to the opinions of others. We quote only one sentence of his to show how unfair he has been. He said: "In the present instance their religious scruples are outraged beyond endurance because the proposed law will compel them to abstain from intercourse with their child-wives until the latter shall have completed their age of full twelve years." Could misrepresentation go further? And this is from a highly cultured, truth-loving and independent gentleman! And on the strength of such opinion, such a cruel law is passed! We are indeed a conquered race and in every way worthy of such humiliation!

A suggestion to Government with reference to the agitation against the Age of Consent Act.

11. The Din Bandhu (9), in its issue of the 12th April, says that the aims and objects of the Age of Consent Act have been misrepresented in various ways to the illiterate and ignorant masses by the foolish agitators who are still carrying on the agitation against the law for the sake of notoriety, and that in order to ensure the safety of its ignorant subjects and to prevent their being discontented the Government should set detective policemen to watch and see how far the agitation is sincere and carried on in a constitutional manner.

Comments on English and Hindu marriage laws.

12. O Portuguez Britannico (157), in its issue of the 11th April, writes:—The people of England would appear to be considerably exercised in mind by the decisions of the Law Courts in what is known as the Clitheroe Abduction Case, and if we are to judge by the tone of the English papers received by the last mail, they regard marriage in a light which shows that their ideas of the ordinances of the religion they profess are no more intelligent or appreciative than are those of the Hindus whom they have unequivocally condemned for their attitude in connection with the recent Age of Consent Bill. The Clitheroe Abduction Case is the first of its kind, and if it is important in the eyes of Englishmen, it should be more so in those of Native Indians. It would be scarcely judicious if we expressed a wish that cases of the same class might be numerous, but there can be no shadow of a doubt that no event or class of events could more thoroughly bring out the pith of the logic of our rulers. It is easy to pose as a moralist without understanding what moral obligations are. It is easy to pass for religious without knowing who or what the Creator is. It is the simplest of all things to proclaim oneself the champion of liberty without possessing the faintest notion of what liberty means. These are all easy enough, and simple enough, and pretenders are numerous enough; but the real character of people must show itself eventually. The time must come when the mask drops off, and the immoral stands revealed as the immoral, the irreligious as the irreligious, and the lawless as the lawless. Setting aside the religious aspect of the question, it is difficult to see in the judgment of the Appellate Court where the wife's moral obligations begin or those of the husband terminate. That in England marriage is a farce is a fact which needs no further confirmation. The law of England according to the interpretation of the Lord Chancellor has not the same respect or regard for the marriage contract that it has for the most ordinary commercial transaction, for whereas it holds that a woman who solemnly enters into a contract and before legally and constituted authorities undertakes to live with and obey a man whom she chooses as her husband, is free to live where she likes and how she likes, it maintains that a man who as a result of miscalculation contracts for a certain sum to do that which would be more than its equivalent, is not free to recede from the position he takes up or to annul the contract. But apart from these considerations it is curious to note how elastic English law and English opinion can be. When the case against Rakhmábái was pending in the law courts of Bombay it was urged that according to the law of England the lady was free to decline to live with her husband because she was under-age when the marriage took place; and now we find the law of England holds that Mrs. Jackson is free to decline to live with Mr. Jackson under precisely the opposite circumstance, and that is that she was above-age and was in the full possession of her senses when she married Mr. Jackson. Verily, such law deserves to be respected!

The law of marriage and the Times of India.

13. The Kesari (42), in its issue of the 14th April, refers to the same case and to the remarks of the Times of India thereon, and observes:—God's ways of doing justice are peculiar. When the case of Dádáji v. Rakhmábái for the restitution of conjugal rights came before the Bombay High Court a few years ago, the Times of India put every obstacle in the way of Dádáji's getting possession of his wife, but the same paper disapproves of the decision of the English Court in the Jackson case and remarks "If this sort of thing goes on marriage will soon be more of a failure than what even Mrs. Mona Caird and the Daily Telegraph would have us believe." Why so? The English Court in appeal has only done in the case of Jackson what the Times of India demanded in the case of Dádáji. The Anglo-Indian papers take delight in discrediting the marriage system of the Hindus, and raise a hue and cry as soon as a small shock is aimed at their own connubial system.

Liberty of the Native Press.

14. The Phœnix (5), in its issue of the 11th April, writes:—The thoughtless writings of some of the newspapers that opposed the Age Bill have been equalled by the wild and sweeping condemnation by the Englishman of Calcutta of the Indian press. That the more rancorous of the Anglo-Indian press should clamour for the suppression of the Indian press is no novel phenomenon. The Pioneer and the Englishman periodically review their neighbours' utterances and they have oftentimes pressed the Government to take note of the sedition, as they are pleased to term it, of the Indian press. But no statesman worthy of the name has countenanced so drastic a measure since the Gagging Act was repealed. The recent agitation against the Age Bill has furnished another opportunity for the Englishman to repeat his old cry, and other organs of Anglo-Indian opinion may follow the lead of our contemporary and write in a similar strain. But we do not think that there is the remotest possibility of the present Government of India moving in a direction so objectionable and unwise. Custom has acquired such a strong ascendancy over men's minds in this unfortunate country that however debasing it may be it requires a very strong effort to abolish it by penal laws. Do Englishmen in India give up their superstition, however patently absurd they may be, without a hard struggle? If the Censorship of the Indian Press is a necessity now, it was no less so in the time of the Ilbert Bill, and if a Censor had then been appointed, and if he had been an impartial judge, there could be hardly any room to doubt that several prominent members of the Anglo-Indian press would have been condemned. Nor could we forget that in the face of the misrepresentations indulged in by the Englishman and his coterie of jingos to bring contempt on the good name of Lord Ripon, all the vehement appeals of the Patrika and the mourning gone into by the National Guardian sink into insignificance. Lord Lansdowne has been misrepresented in several quarters. But was not Lord Ripon subjected to similar indignity? What is misrepresentation according to one's view is right interpretation in that of another. Hence if the charge of misrepresentation were alone sufficient to justify official surveillance over the press, no respectable newspaper, not even the Englishman itself, could be safe. For the natural result of such a contention would be that the moment a newspaper opposes the policy or views of the Government, it would be guilty of misrepresentation. There is absolutely nothing disloyal in the agitation that was being carried on against the Bill in the press. And to whom do the opponents look to for support? It is to Parliament and to Her Majesty's advisers. That we do not commend the wisdom of their policy or the reasonableness of their arguments, must now be abundantly clear to our readers. But it transcends the bounds of ordinary absurdity to argue, as does the Englishman, that those who differ from us or use violent expressions in the midst of an animated and hot controversy are disloyal and seditious. The reasons adduced by our contemporary are not at all to the point. That the speakers at the maidán meeting or in the Pooja at Kallighát at Calcutta raved as they liked has nothing whatever to do with the press and its duties. Nor is the suggestion of a Bengali paper to boycot Manchester goods, to which the Englishman alludes, relevant to the present controversy. Manchester goods have enough of inherent merit in them, the merit of cheapness, and the temptation to use them will be irresistible till cloth of the same quality is manufactured in India and offered for the same price in Indian markets. As for disrespect to constituted authority, protests against the passing of a law is no more an insult to authority than a complaint against the police is disobedience to the laws of the land. The controversy on the Age Bill is doomed to die a natural death as soon as the fervour of the agitators cools down and after some money has been thrown away on it. It is bad enough that our political aspirations have received a rude shock by the division in the Indian camp owing to the extreme conservatism in matters social of our compatriots in this and other parts of India. The Censorship of the Press, if ever seriously thought of, would only undo the good work wrought by the Viceroyalty of Lord Lansdowne, and no more plausible proof of the alleged intention of Government to behave in a despotic manner would be required. It is only such a proposal that is wanted to strengthen the hands of the reactionaries. It is too late in Indian politics to think of suppressing the right inherent in every British-born subject of the freedom of speech and writing. We have strong faith in the good sense of the Indian Government. It is the Englishman that has lost his balance.

The Annual Provincial Conference at Poona.

15. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 12th April, writes:—We are sorry to learn that this year there will be no Provincial Conference. The Sárvajanik Sabha Committee, under whose auspices the Conference used to be held, has resolved that this year no Conference need be held. Mr. Tilak, one of the Secretaries of the Conference, has sent in his resignation. Mr. Gokhale, the other Secretary, wishes to do the same. All that we can say is, that this is to be regretted. The Conference was hailed on all sides as a good institution with promise of better practical results than the Congress itself. [The Dnyán Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 16th April, says that at the earnest request of several gentlemen the Sárvajanik Sabha has resolved to hold the Conference on the 10th proximo.]

Government Resolution on Forest Administration Reports of the Bombay Presidency for 1889-90, reviewed.

16. In noticing the Resolution of Government on the Forest Administration Reports of the Bombay Presidency for 1889-90, the Jáme Jamshed (84), in its issue of the 16th April, says:—It must be gratefully admitted that an appreciable decrease has taken place in the number and quality of the bitter complaints against forest administration that used to be heard in previous years; but, at the same time, it must be observed that the poor aboriginal classes inhabiting forests and cultivators of land do not yet enjoy sufficient liberty to remove worthless forest produce, and that the forest officials care more for an increase of Government revenue from this source than for the wants of these indigent classes. It would have been better, therefore, had Government in this Resolution impressed upon these officials the need of paying due attention to the wants of these classes equally with the attention given to Government income. Government do deserve hearty thanks for removing the wrong impression entertained by Mr. Shuttleworth that in former years the poor classes removed much valuable forest produce inflicting a serious loss on Government, and for impressing on Forest officers the desirability of assigning grazing lands for village cattle in close proximity of their respective villages so far as the same may be practicable.

17. The Din Bandhu (9), in its issue of the 12th April, writes:—We quite approved of the excellent work done by our energetic Municipal Commissioner in taking prompt measures to put up an asylum for lepers at Mátunga temporarily, as a number of those infected with a very loathsome type of that disease were seen daily loitering about. But now we understand it is under contemplation to give up the idea of having an asylum at Trombay and to erect a permanent one at Mátunga. Surely, before according their sanction to make the nice and healthy village of Mátunga the permanent abode of lepers, Government will be so good as to consult their Medical advisers. In our opinion it is very dangerous and extremely ill-advised to locate permanently a leper asylum so near the town of Bombay proper and in close vicinity to two or three crowded villages, viz., Wadála, Gowari and Mátunga. The present site is only a few hundred yards from the village of Gowari the population of which we estimate at more than 500 souls and from the main road which leads to Sion, which, as we all know, throughout its whole length from Parel is lined on both the sides with nice bungalows and pleasure gardens. If Trombay be considered unsuited for a leper asylum, the institution may be located somewhere on the Antop Hill which is further away from the villages named above and which in point of sanitation is in our opinion far superior to the low-lying ground at present selected. If the object in housing lepers together is to prevent them from spreading the contagion it is highly desirable that they should be located far from a crowded neighbourhood, which the present scheme if carried out will not secure. As the inhabitants of the villages we have named are poor and illiterate they are not capable of making a proper representation to Government on this subject. So it will be a greater reason for Government to look into this matter more closely and then to decide it finally. Why, may we ask, was not this leper asylum erected somewhere on the Mahálakshmi Flats or close to the temporary hospitals near the Jacob's Circle? Bombay is gradually extending in the direction of Mátunga, Náigaum and Parel, and when some of the proposed roads and railway stations are opened its population is sure to increase and it would be a grievous mistake to have a leper asylum in the very heart of these localities. In our anxiety for the welfare of the diseased we ought not to sacrifice the well-being of the neighbouring villagers. Will no member of the Municipal Corporation take up this matter in the interests of the poor inhabitants of Gowari and the other villages, and entitle himself to their everlasting gratitude by knocking on the head the proposal of permanently erecting leper asylum at Mátunga?

The question of location of a Leper Asylum near Bombay.

18. A correspondent of the Jáme Jamshed (84), in its issue of the 14th April, complains that the post received at Navsári, on the B. B. & C. I. Railway line, by the day mixed railway trains is not delivered to the addressees on the same day, and expresses a hope that a delivery of the same will be made on the afternoon of the day of receipt. The same correspondent also complains that the post brought after midnight by the mail train is delivered at noon the next day, expressing wonder that it should be so when the post received by the same mail train is delivered before eight o'clock the next morning in the neighbouring villages of Jalálpor, Kályávádi, Tardi and Verávar, which are two or three miles distant from Navsári.

Complaint about the delivery of post at Navsári in the Gáikwár's territory.

Part II.—Municipalities.

19. The Kaiser-i-Hind (85), in its issue of the 12th April, writes:—The Poona Municipality has now been replied to by the Government. But we cannot say that the Government has had the candour to make a confession of the egregious error into which it was led by the Secretariat witches who bear absolutely no love to that corporation. Government is a human institution after all and is liable to err, but when the error is found out it is meet that like every honest unit of humanity it should apologise to those whom it has wronged. But the proud Government of Bombay seems to be only brave in its insolence. Still, as we said before, the much belated but extremely forbearing Poona Municipality has truth on its side, and truth must conquer the mightiest and proudest of Governments.

The Bombay Government and the Poona Municipality.

20. The Hitechchhu (88) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 16th April, complains that much oppression is practiced on the people of Ahmedabad by the local Municipal Corporation in levying the tax for the removal of waste water, saying that the Honorary Magistrates before whom complaints of non-payment are preferred dispose of them without giving the parties complained against a patient hearing and direct the payment of the dues under a threat of increasing their amount, and that the police constables whose duty it is to serve summonses serve them after correcting the wrong names entered therein without the permission of the Magistrates, and in the case of dead persons by leaving them at their houses. It is a pity, says the paper, that persons should be taxed not according to their actual means but according to the dimensions of the houses left to them by their ancestors, and that no notice should be taken either by the Collector or Government of this high-handed treatment by the Municipality which is supported by unscrupulous Honorary Magistrates and over-zealous police constables.

Alleged high-handedness of the Ahmedabad Municipality.

Part III.—Native States.

21. While writing about the recent rising at Manipur the Kaiser-i-Hind (85), in its issue of the 12th April, observes:—Just look at the whole unfortunate affair from the date of the usurpation of the State by the present Mahárája and his right-hand the Commander-in-Chief, and try to discover whether there was the slightest foundation of justice or public expediency to interpose in the affairs of Manipur? It is officially acknowledged that that little State is independent and is governed by no binding treaty of any character whatever. And as to even binding treaties, no one, who has carefully studied the history of the Paramount Power in its relation with feudatory and independent States, can deny that the former considers them binding so long only as it has no selfish ambition or interest to serve. The moment it finds it suitable for its own object to take a front move, it has never hesitated whatever. On the contrary, it is never slow to discover some sort of plausible excuse, to effect annexation of the territory. Now, none can object to such a policy in the affairs of State, if the State which so declares it will not at the same time pretend to proclaim from the house-tops that in its relation with its neighbours it is actuated by pure benevolence and justice. It declares that righteousness is the principle which guides its action, while the fact is that all throughout the century it has become difficult for impartial History to reconcile this abstract principle of righteousness with concrete instances which could be cited by the score of that unjust character. Now, we do say that Manipur managed its own affairs on lines of its own indigenous polity and its own code of political ethics. The Government of India knew it. The State had ere this many a revolution of a similar kind, sometimes bloody, sometimes treacherous. There was nothing, we say, then, which was unusual in the usurpation of the Jubráj to impel the Government of India to chastise him. And, therefore, we say that it was an unjustifiable step which it took when it sent secret instructions to Mr. Quinton to move with a small force on that State with a view of chastising the Commander-in-Chief who was mainly instrumental in raising him to the throne. But the motive which led to the interference by the Government of India is as transparent as the noon-day sun. Of course, we know that the motive will be indignantly repudiated; that the history which led to the mission will be manufactured in a way to lead the public to believe that it was not this poor meek Government, so righteously and so religiously inclined that it never had any object at any time of defrauding a neighbour of even a single lock of his hair,—it was not this model Government which behaved "treacherously" but the little border Ráj. We also know what kind of official papers and blue-books will appear in due course. These undoubtedly will give the narrative from the official point of view. But what about the Manipur narrative? As usual, we shall be told later on that it is not to be trusted. Truth always is on the side of the strong. Providence always favours the big battalions. Therefore, the success of the battalions is the triumph of truth. But despite such contemptible and ignoble stuff, there have been Anglo-Indians who have in former days warned us not to implicitly trust in official narratives. And in our own days we see before our very eyes how history is being constantly perverted. The late Mr. Iltudus Pritchard in speaking on Native States and the British Government about 20 years ago, truthfully observed that, "India described from a native point of view would present a very different picture from the India represented in blue-books and official reports and the works of officially inspired writers." The Government of India for the past ten years seems to be tempted by Fate. Its ambition has been to enlarge its boundaries east and west. It has already done so to a considerable extent, and the interference in Manipur affairs is only a means to the same ambitious object. The real motive of the Government may then be related in a sentence. It is to annex that State. With the annexation of Upper Burmah and the stretching of the outposts to Bhamo and further north-east, Manipur is absolutely necessary to British greed and British earth-hunger. When the real history of the usurpation by Jubráj comes to be written, it will be found that the British Indian Government was behind the scenes. The ex-Mahárája was dethroned on the plea that he was a Fakir Rája. In reality, he was, perhaps, impervious to British demands. But the moment the usurpation was accomplished, the Jubráj was not slow to defy the Resident as his predecessor had done. What could be better under the circumstances, thus foiled in its attempt to make independent Manipur a vassalage of the empire, than to play off Surachunder Sing. We will not say whether the flight of the ex-Mahárája to Calcutta was intentional or accidental. Suffice to say, ample negotiations must have been carried on, informally, of course, and adequate promises must have been taken from him that the reward of the British Indian Government, in placing him on the throne, should be that it should be allowed to have the upper sway in his administration; that in fact Manipur should virtually be British territory; but to avoid annexation the Mahárája should be the sovereign or puppet. Our surmise is that it was with this object only that Mr. Quinton was directed to move on the capital of Manipur. We know what the subsequent history is. The Government of India sowed the wind of the Manipur rising and it is now reaping the whirlwind of disasters and what not which it will require perhaps a quarter crore or more of the wretched tax-payers' monies to wipe off. This is the moral of the interference in an independent State for the sake of British earth-hunger.

The Vaidarbh (2), in its issue of the 11th April, writes :—It looks strange that a Municipality under the chairmanship of an educated European gentleman should disregard so utterly the law of Municipalities in Berár and rules made under it in passing its resolutions. At the meeting of the Sheogaon Municipal Committee held on 23rd January last it was "proposed by Mr. Mároti Kurtáji and seconded by Mr. Durgaya Pillay that the collection of the Town Fund Tax be given to the Patil as is done at Khamgaon and Akote. The following members voted in favour of the proposition :—Messrs. D. Pillay, Mároti Kurtáji and E. C. Rich, Chairman. And the following against it :—Messrs. Gopál Govind, Bhagwán Mánáji, Bankat Bhavánidás. The proposal was carried by the "casting vote of the Chairman." The Committee, it appears, thought the resolution to be incomplete and considered the subject again on 2nd March 1891. They "read letter from the Chairman of the Khamgaon Municipality informing the Chairman of the Sheogaon Municipality that the Patil of Khamgaon collects the Town Fund of that place and that he is paid remuneration at Rs. 3 per cent. on the collection made by him, and resolved by a majority that the Police Patil of Sheogaon be intrusted with the collection of the Town Fund Tax for 1890-91 and that in future years the Police Patil be also intrusted with the collection of the Town Fund." Both these resolutions are illegal as they stand at variance with Section 146 of Municipal Law and Rule 10 made under it. The Police Patil is Mr. Máruti Kurtáji who is a member of the Municipality and Honorary Secretary thereof. He can accept no contract from the Municipality under the foregoing section. If he chooses to have the contract he must resign his place as a Municipal member. It is indeed more to be wondered at that such a proposal which was in itself illegal was allowed to be moved by Mr. Máruti Patil himself, the Vice-Chairman seconding it, and the Chairman passing it by his casting vote. We are informed that last year the collection was made by municipal servants and the work was done satisfactorily. This year too the Committee, when considering their budget for 1891-92, intended to get the work done through municipal servants, and did not therefore allot any amount for being given as commission to the Patil for the collection of the tax. But a few days after, some members changed their mind and passed by a majority such an illegal resolution. The Committee have gone so far as to get the future Committees bound to get Town Fund collected through the Patil and give him commission for the work!! Copies of all municipal resolutions are sent to the Deputy Commissioner and the Commissioner. But it does not appear they have attracted attention. We are informed that some members of the Sheogaon Municipality have sent a protest against the resolution in question to the Commissioner, and it is to be hoped the illegal action of the Committee will be set aside.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

1. The Mahárdshtrá Mitrá (45), in its issue of the 23rd April, publishes a message intended for Her Imperial Majesty Queen Victoria, in which the Empress is implored to pay a visit to India to witness personally how her Indian subjects are oppressed by Her Majesty's representatives and officers, and how they are starved for want of remunerative work and encouragement and denied justice, though repeatedly prayed for.

A prayer to Her Imperial Majesty Queen Victoria.

2. The Kaiser-i-Hind (85), in its issue of the 19th April, observes:—At the conclusion of an address delivered at Staffordshire, a few days ago, by Lord Cross, a resolution was passed by the meeting declaring his Indian administration to have been very successful. This opinion is, however, far from the truth, as, in the first place, the real administrators of India are the Viceroy, the Governors and Lieutenant-Governors, and the Secretary of State has only to supervise their work; but in doing so he has always supported the views of those officers, even when they were mistaken. During Lord Cross' tenure of office not a single act has been done which has pleased the Natives, while many of his measures have disappointed them. The promise that he gave of reducing the enhanced duty on salt has not yet been fulfilled. He has declined to grant elective franchise to our Legislative Councils and has introduced a Bill which stands in opposition to that proposed by Mr. Bradlaugh. Much has been said against the ábkári policy of Government, but Lord Cross has not removed the hardships of the people in that direction. He has shown a leaning towards the Lancashire cotton manufacturers in their selfish agitation to crush the Indian mill industry. He manifested only a few weeks ago his indifference to the well-being of this country, by getting the most objectionable Bill permitting Viceroys and other high officials to go home on short leave, without resigning their posts, passed by the House of Lords. These are some of the instances showing that Lord Cross does not deserve the honour which the resolution seeks to confer upon him.

Remarks on the resolution passed at a meeting held at Staffordshire praising Lord Cross, Secretary of State for India.

3. In alluding to the serious charges brought against Captain E. H. Verney, a Gladstonian-Liberal Member for Buckingham, and Mr. E. S. W. De Cobain, Conservative Member for Belfast (East), the Gujaráti (81), in its issue of the 19th April, observes:—On hearing that warrants had been issued for their arrest both the accused have fled the country, and this circumstance leads one to surmise that there is some truth in the allegations made against them. These and other instances of immorality in high circles among Englishmen at home which have recently come to light, show that the standard of morality in India is decidedly superior to that prevailing in England.

Serious charges against Captain E. H. Verney and Mr. E. S. W. De Cobain, Members of Parliament.

4. The Hindusthán (106), in its issue of the 19th April, observes:—The British Indian subjects had a very high opinion of the morality of the Members of Parliament till very recently, but the immoral acts of which Sir Charles Dilke and Mr. Parnell have been convicted have effected a material change in their opinion. We pray Her Imperial Majesty the Queen to take severe notice of similar immoralities and declare those guilty of them to be ineligible for a seat in Parliament. The Gujarát Darpan (80), in its issue of the same date, observes:—Some of the Englishmen who make reflections on the natives of India and other countries by observing that great immorality prevails among them, will do well to learn what is passing at home before slandering others.

5. The Indu Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 20th April, writes:—Mr. Justice Scott has after all retired from his post of High Court Judge, for a judicial post in Egypt. He was among us for nearly eight years, and made himself a very useful and popular citizen. As Judge he was patient, painstaking and affable and commanded the affection of the Bar and the public. He took an active part in social movements and evinced a large-minded interest in our hopes and aspirations. In social matters he was ably assisted by Mrs. Scott, a lady of great culture and capacity for philanthropic work. His retirement causes a permanent vacancy on the High Court Bench, and the question is who is to succeed him. If popular opinion in Bombay had any choice in the matter, it would unhesitatingly declare itself in favour of Mr. Justice Farran, who has been acting for Mr. Justice Scott. Mr. Justice Farran, both on the present occasion as well as on a previous one when he acted as an extra Judge, showed himself to be quite an ideal Judge, winning the confidence and esteem of the Bench, the Bar and the public. Now that a permanent vacancy has occurred, let us hope Mr. Farran's claims will not be overlooked.

Praise of Mr. John Nugent, Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay.

6. The Kaiser-i-Hind (85), in its issue of the 19th April, observes:—Mr. John Nugent, after working as Chief Secretary for many years, is about to take charge of one of the Divisional Commissionerships. It is doubtful whether any other officer would have spent so many years in the hard-worked Secretariat. In his new office he will have less onerous duties to perform, but will gain experience which will strengthen his claims to a seat on the local Executive Council. Mr. Nugent is an able and conscientious officer, who has since his joining the Secretariat always appointed under him deserving men without distinction of caste or creed, promoting them according to their merits. His subordinates have always been glad to serve under him.

Mr. Fairlie Muir's career as Collector of Belgaum highly approved.

7. The Belgaum Samáchár (23), in its issue of the 20th April, while reviewing the career of Mr. Fairlie Muir as Collector of Belgaum, on the eve of his departure on two years' furlough, says:—On his appointment as Collector of Belgaum the people were very uneasy at the report of his being of a fiery temperament, but after he took charge of his duties they began to appreciate his disposition and have gradually become satisfied with it. He is very patient and laborious in the performance of his duties, and is regular and punctual in despatching his work. He knows all his subordinates and their worth and does not, like other people, depend upon his Chitnis alone. It is his practice to settle beforehand the programme of his movements on the circuit and to publish it for the information of the public, and he seldom changes it subsequently. His subordinates are satisfied with him and have received promotions according to their claims. He knows the petty Jághirdárs in his Collectorate and has regard for them. His reports to Government in the matter of remissions to the cultivators have been satisfactory both to Government and the rayats. In short, he is a typical Collector, and we wish him a pleasant journey and a speedy return to us with renewed vigour, not as Collector but as Divisional Commissioner.

A prayer to reduce the salt-duties.

8. The Jáme Jamshed (84), in its issue of the 23rd April, says:—The figures of the salt revenue for 1890-91 have been recently published, showing that the large amount of 799 lákhs of rupees was realized this year. This is an unusually large income from this source, but has been realized at a heavy sacrifice of the important interests of the public. In spite of the growth of the population during the last five years, 1886-87 to 1890-91, there has been a decrease in the consumption of salt. In the latter year the consumption was less than in the former year by 452,000 maunds. If Lord Dufferin's Government had not made the mistake of raising the salt-duties, the consumption would have increased in proportion to the growth of the population, bringing up the revenue to about 7½ krors by this time. It has now become quite plain that the salt-duties ought to be reduced in the interests of the public, and a prayer to that effect was submitted by the recent meeting of the Indian National Congress, but it was negatived by Government, thereby sorely disappointing the public. Injustice of this nature is likely to be perpetrated until the people get a share in the administration and control on the treasury of the country.

9. In noticing the reply of His Excellency Lord Harris to the two petitions presented to him at Bijápur relating to accommodation and train service on the Southern Marátha Railway, the Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 21st April, says :—The reply is in some particulars disappointing. The answers concerning the speed of the trains and the difficulty of obtaining refreshment on the line vouchsafed by His Excellency are quite appropriate and unobjectionable; but the replies about the two other inconveniences complained of are not so and look rather evasive. Seeing that the absence of retiring accommodation in third class carriages produces bad effects on the health of the passengers, it is surprising that the pleas of its not being "usual to provide such accommodation and of the Railway Company finding it a matter of expenditure" to supply the convenience should have been advanced by His Excellency. The complaint about long and frequent stoppages did not meet with proper attention. His Excellency, however, promised to bring the matters to the notice of the Railway Company, and, if the assertions of the petitioners be found to be correct, to try to induce the Company to meet their wishes. Thus the redress of the grievances of the petitioners is to depend upon the good graces of the Railway Company, which, it is not improbable, might plead its inability to do so. Should such a result follow, His Excellency the Governor would be found fault with. It would have been better had the petitioners been informed by His Excellency that their grievances were such as could not be removed. Such a reply would have been more satisfactory than the evasive one received by the petitioners. [The Satyavakta (120) of the 24th April expresses similar sentiments.]

Reply of His Excellency the Governor to the people of Bijápur in connection with the grievances of the third class passengers on the Southern Marátha Railway, considered unsatisfactory.

10. The Dnyán Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 23rd April, states that a compounder of Sir Jamsetji Jeejeebhoy Hospital at Bombay, by name Govind Ganesh Kákde, was fined Rs. 3 by the House Surgeon for making up without his permission a prescription written by Dr. Bahádurji for an indoor patient, and having failed to obtain from Surgeon Gray, Senior Surgeon, redress of his grievance, resigned his appointment and appealed to Government in the matter, but received a reply to the effect that Government saw no reason to interfere with the orders already passed by the authorities. The paper disapproves of this reply, saying that Government do not appear to have made necessary enquiries, as they have not called for the compounder's explanation, and recommending His Excellency Lord Harris to call for the papers in the case and to be pleased to make amends to the unfortunate man.

Alleged injustice to a compounder in Sir J. J. Hospital, Bombay, and prayer to His Excellency Lord Harris in the matter.

11. In alluding to the conviction of the accused Bachu Haji Abdulla on a charge of murder by causing the deaths of five persons in Kámbekar Street on 22nd January last, at the current Criminal Sessions of the Bombay High Court, the Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 22nd April, says that the Bombay police deserves great credit for unravelling what appeared at first a confounding mystery and obtaining satisfactory evidence that has convincingly brought home the crime to the accused and secured his conviction, and observes :—The jury in this case has rightly drawn the attention of the Court to the facility with which a deadly poison like strychnia is sold in the bazar without record of any kind. It was deposed in Court that this poison was sold like any ordinary drug or article, and this raises the fear that perhaps its use for the purpose of murder was more common than is believed to be. It is, therefore, desirable that the sale of strychnia should be at once controlled under proper safeguards. It would be well to limit its sale to licensed vendors of poisonous drugs and to insist upon a record being kept of its sales. [The Akhbáre Sodágar (92), in its issue of the same date, expresses similar sentiments.]

The sale of strychnia in the Bombay market recommended to be controlled under proper safeguards.

12. The Khándesh Chitragupta (43), in its issue of the 19th April, says that the intense heat of the weather at Dhulia has given rise to an epidemic in which persons suddenly fall into a swoon and die instantaneously, names four instances of such sudden deaths, and requests the medical authorities of Government to notice this disease and to find a remedy for it.

Delay in the payment of wages to Census clerks.

13. The same newspaper regrets that the clerks temporarily appointed to do census work have not been paid for the first month though nineteen days of the second month have elapsed, and says that immense inconvenience is caused to them in consequence.

Robberies in the Dhárwár District.

14. Alluding to the robberies recently committed in certain villages of the tálukás of Ránebennur and Gadag in the Dhárwár District, in which property worth 30 to 40 thousand rupees is said to have been stolen, the Rasik Ranjani (137), in its issue of the 16th April, observes that no traces have as yet been found of either the stolen property or the thieves by the police, that these robberies have given rise to a sense of insecurity of life and property among the rich, and that the police officers should therefore be more vigilant in the performance of their duties.

A request in connection with the Elephanta Caves.

15. A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 23rd April, says:—There is no building whatever at Elephanta for the Hindu visitors to the caves to cook and take their food in, and it is to be hoped that some sort of convenience will be provided. In the presence of the Hindu visitors and the policeman posted at Elephanta to guard the caves from being in any way mutilated, European lads sit upon the idol in one of these caves and play at turning round, and it is said that grown up Europeans also do similarly. In deference to Hindu feelings such desecration ought to be prohibited, and European visitors should be warned not to hurt the feelings of the Hindus.

Alleged cause of increased consumption of intoxicating liquors in Berár.

16. A correspondent of the Jáme Jamshed (84), in its issue of the 22nd April, says that in spite of the closing of two hundred liquor shops in Berár, exclusive of the Básim district, the ábkári revenue, which brought in last year ten lákhs of rupees, has this year realized eleven lákhs, and that this result is to be attributed to one and the same person being contractor for liquor and toddy, who encourages the sale of liquor at the expense of that of toddy, increasing thereby the consumption of and mischief from the former.

Part II.—Education.

Draft University Bill as amended by the Senate of the Bombay University approved.

17. The Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 23rd April, approves of the amendments made by the Senate of the Bombay University in the draft University Bill as regards the qualification for Fellowships and election of Fellows by cumulative voting, and expresses a hope that the Bill will now be soon passed into law.

Discontinuance of a grant-in-aid to an English school at Wái, and certain other matters.

18. The Poona Vaibhav (93), while alluding in its issue of the 19th April to the alleged discontinuance of a grant of Rs. 750 which the new English school at Wái in the Sátára District is said to have received from the Educational Department for some years past, remarks:—Government should not have withheld the aid from the school at the suggestion of a few wicked persons, and we hope that they will desist from doing injury to the town by depriving it of the benefit of the grant without minutely enquiring into its municipal matters. It is said that strenuous efforts are being made to stop the publication of the Mod Vritt newspaper, which writes strongly on behalf of the townspeople. If this report be well-founded it is really a matter for surprise. Should Government depute one of their trusted officers to ascertain the real state of things at Wái and stop the tyranny that is being practised there the people would feel considerable relief, and we pray that Government may adopt this course.

Part III.—Municipalities.

Proposed increase in the police charges of Bombay.

19. In noticing the letter addressed by Government to the President of the Municipal Corporation, Bombay, on the subject of increasing the strength of the Bombay Police force, the Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 20th April, says:—When the municipal administration of the City of Bombay was in the hands of Government, it was complained that the municipal funds were disposed of by the Municipal officers just as they liked, or just as the Government directed them to spend these funds, and a heavy burden of debt was placed on the shoulders of the municipal tax-payer. The concession of local self-government was therefore hailed with genuine joy, as it was believed that the concession would effectually remove the complaint. However, to this day matters have not improved in the least; the Corporation is called upon by Government to incur or pay certain expenses and the former submits to the demand either because it is supported by a clause in the Municipal Act or because the Corporation thinks it but meet to please the Government. For a few days past the Municipality has been treated by Government like a rich Corporation, and several burdens that were formerly borne by Government itself have been transferred to its shoulders. This treatment has been several times protested against by us, producing however little or no effect. The letter from Government to the Corporation above alluded to is written in the same old spirit. The contribution of ninety thousand rupees per annum hitherto made by Government towards the cost of the police is to be continued for two years more and then to be stopped; but this allotment being in lieu of the proceeds of the local tax on tobacco and ábkári, it seems strange that no mention of this arrangement should have been made in the letter of Government. Government should be reminded of these taxes, which legitimately belong to the Corporation, and the latter should be prepared to take legal measures for their recovery from Government if an unsatisfactory reply is received from the authorities in connection with them. [The Jáme Jamshed (84) and the Akhbáre Sodágar (92), in their issues of the same date, express similar sentiments. The Jáme adds that there is no necessity for making any addition to the police force, as the population of the city has not according to the recent census increased to such an extent as to justify any increment.]

Part IV.—Native States.

The Manipuris praised for their valour.

20. The Poona Vaibhav (53), in its issue of the 19th April, writes:—Manipur, though isolated, appears from its name to be a Hindu State. We regard the Manipuris, though Hindus, as our enemies on account of their having risen against our Government. There is, however, one circumstance in connection with the recent outbreak in that State which is of some interest and it is this, that the outbreak is likely to remove the impression, which has been created by the fact of no Hindu State having raised its head since 1857, that the Hindus are of no more consequence than worms. Though the State of Manipur is small, it has shown that its people are not such as will submit to any pressure that may be put on them. There is not the least likelihood of the Manipuris achieving success in their present hostilities, but it is some consolation that the Jubraj has not brought himself into discredit by cowardly conduct, as was done by the King of Kashmere, His Highness Malhárráo Gáikwár and Theebaw, who showed that the Hindus possessed no valour at all. Formerly when there was any rising in the country some States joined one side and some the other, but under the rule of the British people nothing of the kind is possible and every Chief is leading a quiet life in the enjoyment of his own State. Under these circumstances no one will consider it an insignificant thing that a small State like Manipur should have made itself bold to confront the British Government. Downfall is as inevitable to a nation as death is to an individual, and it is vain to suppose that the nations, which are at the present moment the most flourishing on the face of the earth, will ever remain so. Every nation is bound to save itself from discredit. A nation is degraded if it allows itself to be subdued by another nation. It must therefore be admitted that the Manipuris have preserved their dignity. Though their resources are limited, they have ready for action a force of about 30,000 men with a fairly large number of guns. It is beyond doubt that in a week or so the State will be totally defeated by the British Government. Indeed, it is not good to rival a strong enemy, but it is equally undeniable that one should not let himself be ill-treated, degraded and outraged while alive. The Manipuris therefore deserve praise for being prepared to give preference to death over degradation. Since nobody is ready to endanger his safety without cause, the Manipuris have evidently been subjected to oppression of some sort or other by the British Government, and if so, it is derogatory to the latter. Manipur being far removed from us we cannot know accurately the real cause of the present hostilities, but inference cannot be altogether unreliable. However, we do not propose to say anything more for the present. We only hope that the British Government will soon be free from the impending trouble and will rule over us without any uneasiness.

Remarks on the rising at Manipur.

21. The Sudhárak (18), in its issue of the 20th April, writes:—It would be premature to definitely fix the blame of the Manipur rising on any particular person, though it appears beyond all doubt that Mr. Quinton and his men acted very rashly and that Mr. Grimwood throughout showed himself to be an absolutely unfit Political Agent. But, howsoever the responsibility for the rising may be ultimately distributed, one thing is certain—that the Mahárája and the Senápati of Manipur have acted not only with incredible folly but also with great treachery, and that their fate is therefore sealed. They have had the astounding presumption to beard the British Lion, and they have only to thank themselves if they are made to experience the fury of that noble animal.

Circumstances which led to the massacre of officers of the British Mission to Manipur.

22. The Dnyán Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 20th April, writes:—The Calcutta correspondent of the Bombay Gazette in his telegraphic report of the 16th instant says: "A telegram from Kohima states that the troops which went to arrest Jubraj in his palace killed in the fighting which followed, evidently by mistake, some children and women relatives of the Jubraj. This may partially account for the ferocity which he displayed towards his European captives." The italics are our own. Now if the information from Kohima be true, and if we interpret it correctly, it means that during the time (i.e., from daybreak to 7 P.M. on the 24th ultimo) the attack on the Jubraj's palace lasted—an aggressive and offensive measure initiated under the orders of Mr. Quinton himself for the purpose of effecting the capture of the Mahárája in consequence of his having failed to comply with the ultimatum of the previous evening—the lamentable incident referred to above took place; in short, the lamentable incident must have taken place during the day time. The troops which took part in the attack were all of them Native troops, but they were under the direct control of their European officers, and we cannot understand how they could have been allowed even to molest, still less to kill outright, children and women—whether they were relatives of the Mahárája or his dependents. The fact that the victims are alleged to have been the relatives of the Mahárája intensifies the enormity of the offence. The object of the attack was to effect the capture of the Mahárája, and it is inconceivable that the ladies and children of the Jubraj's family could have offered any resistance to the troops. Then again it is impossible to conceive what the expression "evidently by mistake" means. Are we to understand that the children and women were mistaken for adult males bent upon, or capable of, offering resistance? Or are we to understand that when the troops killed the children and women, knowing them to be such, they were not aware that their victims were the relatives of the Mahárája? From our point of view it is absolutely immaterial whether the victims were or were not relatives of the Mahárája; the simple fact that the victims were children and women is sufficient to brand the deed in the way it deserves to be in the eyes of the civilized world. And it is not at all improbable that the massacre of the British Mission was not partially but principally due, if not wholly, to this lamentable incident. A large portion of the troops which took part in the attack on the Jubraj's palace on the morning of the 24th ultimo, with some of their European officers, having survived the final catastrophe, it behoves the Government of India to inquire fully into all the facts connected with this lamentable incident, and to adequately punish those who were responsible for it. And if the facts should turn out to be as they are stated in the telegram from Kohima, it behoves the Government of India to take a somewhat lenient view of the offence of those who have had anything to do with the massacre of the British Mission. This is especially necessary, we think, to inspire confidence among the Manipuris regarding the sincerity of the avowed object of the present punitive expedition, which, it is officially announced, is to punish only those who have had anything to do with the massacre of the British Mission. It is further officially announced that none else need apprehend any molestation at the hands of the avenging army, and that injury to the life and property of the people of the Manipur State will be scrupulously avoided. We trust that this declaration will be most strictly given effect to by the officers commanding the three columns now assembled for the purpose.

Suggestions to Government in connection with the disturbance at Manipur.

23. The Indu Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 20th April, writes:—The full authentic details that are now published about the Manipur outbreak give cause to suspect that the fault of the recent catastrophe is not all on the side of the Manipuris. The death of Mr. Quinton and his party is indeed to be greatly regretted. It is also true, as has been contended by a contemporary, that no contumaciousness of a Native Chief towards the paramount power is to be tolerated. But the question arises how far the action of the British officers on the spot was contributory to the fatal results. The accounts published leave no doubt that the whole expedition was planned with an offensive object. A detachment of troops was left a few miles from Manipur, and an English officer was ordered to keep himself in readiness to return to the camp with a guard of 80 men. At the Residency on the occasion of the first darbár a more than usually strong guard was arrayed at the back of the Residency. At the darbár a British officer was made to sit by the side of each Manipuri present. Enquiries were made about the Jubraj, and the Mahárája, after waiting for two or three hours, had to depart without being presented to the Chief Commissioner. These facts did not escape the notice of the Manipuris, and it is not surprising that they understood them as indications of hostile intentions against the Jubraj. If the Manipuris did not attend any of the subsequent darbárs, they did what most intelligent persons would do under the circumstances, and they can hardly be blamed for not having surrendered the Jubraj of their own accord to be made a prisoner. The offensive was taken by the British officers in the first instance, as the Mahárája himself subsequently remarked. The Manipuris in self-defence retaliated. They had the advantage of the British both in point of numbers and defensive position, and they not only successfully defended themselves, but completely routed their assailants. Why did the British officers commence hostilities against such odds? Contempt of the enemy and abounding confidence in oneself lead invariably to a fall. Even after the attack there was a succession of blunders, relieved only by individual heroism as that of Mrs. Grimwood. The ill-fated expedition seems to have been as if deliberately led to destruction. The Manipuris did indeed a wicked act in killing the British officers who had gone to them under a flag of truce, but their acts under provocation and the excitement and flush of victory cannot be too finely weighed. Why did the British officers deliberately put their lives in jeopardy? Further, it is at least doubtful whether the prisoners met their death at the hands of the infuriated soldiery or by the orders of any responsible officer. Mr. Williams' account absolves the Mahárája and his higher officers of complicity, and even represents the Mahárája as having expressed regret. The British Government has proclaimed that their hostility is not with the Manipur people, but with the present rulers. The offending rulers might retort that their hostility is not with the British Government but with the officers who attacked them, and that in respect of the latter they only exercised the right of self-defence, a right which belongs to prince and peasant alike under the laws of Her Majesty the Empress. These considerations we put down here not with a view to mitigate the offence of the Manipuris.

We have no sympathy with them; no desire to justify their acts. If they have done a wrong, let them meet with just retribution. But what we are apprehensive of is that in the heat of exasperation at the loss of life, at the discomfiture of British arms, the loss of prestige, and so forth, the cry of revenge will ring aloud, and such a cry is apt to make even sober men lose their balance of mind. Wild fanaticism may take possession of the men who may be employed to do the work of retribution. It is with a view to assert the claims of reason, patient thought, and judgment that we here endeavour to show that our rulers in ordering the retribution must look behind and beyond the grave facts of death and defeat, which first strike the imagination and impel measures of reparation. In the midst of the cry of revenge that is raised all round, we know it is a cry in the wilderness to talk of patience, moderation and other self-denying virtues. Nevertheless we deem it our duty to caution Government against being carried away by the over-zeal and resentful temper of military officers. In meting out punishment to Manipur we would ask Government to bear in mind the blunders committed by their own officers and the aggravation received by the Manipuris; how far the British officers were justified in their acts by the instructions they had received, and whether the reprisals on the part of the Manipuris were results of accident or wilful malice. A distinction might perhaps be made in the relative guilt of the Mahárája, the Jubraj, the Senápati and the other individuals who have figured prominently in the drama. The kind treatment of the prisoners, the regret expressed at the death of some of them, and the voluntary release of others are facts which deserve to be noted. On the whole, there is every reason to be circumspect, judicious and moderate, and to be careful not to be carried away by the general frenzy.

24. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 23rd April, requests Government not to be led away by the selfish clamour of Anglo-Indian newspapers for the annexation of the Manipur State. The Government, adds the paper, should carefully enquire into the cause of the disturbance and ascertain whether the Manipuris are solely responsible for it, or whether the British soldiers had done anything to exasperate their feelings. It should also be considered whether the mismanagement at Manipur has been such as to justify its annexation. The mere fact of the massacre of some European officers is not a sufficient reason for the annexation of the State. The act in itself is, indeed, most culpable, but it is sufficient to adequately punish only those who took a leading part in it. The subjects of the Manipur State do not all hate the British, and have been always willing to keep friendly relations with them. The sole cause of mismanagement in that State is the domestic quarrel between the Rája and his brothers for the possession of the throne, and the Government will do justice to the State by installing him who has superior claims to the gádi.

Disapproval of the recommendation to annex Manipur.

25. In a communicated article the Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 19th April, writes:—Your Anglo-Indian contemporaries, as is their wont, have recommended annexation, pure and simple. In the present temper of military counsel at Simla the step is more likely to be resolved upon than not. But the Viceroy, as a responsible administrator of the country as a whole, ought to judge for himself whether such an extreme step is in the first place indispensable, and secondly, advisable. The annexation of Burma has already added to our responsibilities to a very large extent, the expenses of whose administration are yet far ahead of revenue. The question, therefore, whether preparations on such a large scale as are reported to have been contemplated are expedient in the present financial circumstances of the country, with a bare estimated surplus of 11 lákhs, with opium revenue going down and exchange not looking up, is one which ought to be decided on more points than one. We have again the helpless ex-Mahárája of Manipur in Calcutta, whose claims to be reinstated might be fitly and, as we think, profitably considered at such a juncture. In short, the little punitive war ought by no means to be allowed to swallow a neat big sum, so as to upset the consoling calculations of Sir David in the beginning of the official year. Mr. Johnstone's advice from that point of view, we venture to assert, is extremely practical as well as reasonable.

26. The Indu Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 20th April, says that the British Government is responsible for the disturbance at Manipur and advises it not to annex the State, as the step will create uneasiness in the minds of other Native Princes. The attack on Manipur, adds the paper, should not be made with the view of revenge, for the British troops are likely to behave themselves in a manner that will bring the British Government into discredit. Those who assassinated Mr. Quinton and other officers should, no doubt, be punished after full enquiry into the matter, and the Manipur campaign should be brought to an end with the installation of the present or deposed Rája according to the choice of the Manipuria.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ā) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Present condition of India.

1. The Chandánshu (25), in its issue of the 26th April, says:—Externally peace seems to prevail in India, but internally the country is not at rest. This fact cannot be well proved by a Native; a foreigner only can do it effectually. Englishmen act high-handedly and unjustly with the Natives, and yet we call them just and profess our loyalty to them. To test the correctness of the above assertions one has only to ascertain the objects of the various movements that are set up by the people throughout the country. The attempts that are being made in several places by the educated people to get arbitration courts show that the people are tired of the costliness of the justice dispensed by British courts, which have gradually reduced the country to poverty. Government assist the people in getting the arbitration courts, but do not make any exertions to improve their own courts of justice. His Imperial Highness the Czarewitch is said to have addressed a letter to his august father, giving an account of his travels in India, and in it the Prince has stated that the people in India are ground down under the burden of taxation in the form of stamp duties for suits, petitions, partition deeds, receipts and other transactions, and that they entertain no regard for their rulers. It is not a good thing that there should be so much discontent in the country, as it might lead to serious consequences one day. British statesmen ought to pay particular attention to this state of things.

Solicitude of the Commons in England for the well-being of the people of India considered praiseworthy.

2. The Phœnix (5), in its issue of the 22nd April, writes:—The Commons of England have displayed praiseworthy solicitude for the moral well-being of the people by passing resolutions on the Contagious Diseases Act, the Ábkári system and the opium trade. Such a succession of beneficent legislation on behalf of India shows unmistakably that neither considerations of revenue nor false ideas of upholding the dignity of the Indian Government could induce the House of Commons to overlook moral considerations that ought to weigh with every Government that is based on the good-will of the people. The House of Commons now and then prove to the world that they recognise not only in theory that righteousness exalteth a nation, but that they are willing to apply it to practical politics whenever there are sufficient grounds for such an interference. That the resolution was carried by a narrow majority need not detract from its worth. It is calculated to do immense good to the cause of humanity, and in view of the thick mass of ignorance that prevails in England in regard to Indian questions and the general opinion that obtains in that country that the Indian Government is free from any blemishes, it is a matter for congratulation that even a bare majority could be found to support a motion which would cause no small perplexity to the Indian Finance Minister. Sir John Pease and his coadjutors are entitled to the thanks of the public. It is a significant sign of the times that the Parliament is often called upon to worthily discharge its duty as the highest appellate authority in Indian affairs. To those of the educated in India who consider that the British Government has no responsibility in regard to the moral regeneration of this country, and that it will hesitate to remove misery, vice and degradation or will countenance cruel practices, this would serve as a warning that the heart of the British nation needs only to be roused to the sufferings of the people, and that it makes a clean sweep of all obstacles, however formidable they may be, that stand in the way of its furthering the interests of humanity or promoting the happiness of the people committed to its care.

Remarks in connection with the resolution of the House of Commons condemning the opium policy of the Government of India.

3. The Subodh Patrika (17), in its issue of the 26th April, writes;—The resolution of the House of Commons condemning the opium policy of the Government of India is being received with much greater opposition and ridicule by the Government organs and other English papers which generally represent the school of muscular politics, than its similar decision regarding the Ábkári policy was received two years ago. Yet while the old resolution was adopted by a majority of ten only, the present one was supported by three times that number in a House more numerously attended. Now, as then, it is expected, and even suggested, that the vote should be treated as a joke, not seriously to be attended to by the Executive Government. This is hard to understand, nor is it wise of these publicists to urge this kind of insubordinate attitude towards the highest legislative authority in the Empire, and thus to detract from the forces which go to make up loyalty. We believe, however, that in spite of these improper remonstrances efforts will be made to carry out the views of the House of Commons as far and as early as possible, as has been done in the case of the ábkári question. Of course, in the present case the difficulties are immensely greater, because a revenue of some six krors of rupees has to be provided before the opium traffic could be stopped altogether, and in this situation the Government of India needs all public sympathy and support; but it must, at the same time, be remembered that the cultivation of opium in China has been gradually, and will be, diminishing this revenue, and that some provision against its total disappearance must sooner or later be made, either by curtailing expenditure or by adding to income in some way or other. Of course, taxation in India can hardly admit of an increase in any direction, and relief must therefore be sought for from some other source. Is there any such source? We venture to think there is one; but it will require a serious effort and much courage in the Government of India to approach it. If it does put forth this exertion, the party in the House which has helped to pass the opium resolution will doubtless come to its aid, and suggestions are already being made for meeting the revenue difficulty. Our idea is that the Government of India should avail itself of this opportunity to thoroughly examine its financial relations with England and seek to be relieved of those imperial charges, including the entire cost of the India Office, which are unfairly saddled on this country. There could not be a more fitting or more favourable opportunity for bringing about this great act of national justice, or rather for averting this injustice, and we would humbly invite the attention of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne and his Council to this important matter. The assumption that China will cultivate its opium, whether India sends the supply or not, is not correct, because the Chinese Government sanctioned its cultivation when it found itself compelled by the British Government to receive the Indian drug. So that if this supply is stopped, it is more than probable that the Chinese Government will also prohibit its cultivation. But if this is not done, the Chinese competition is admittedly undermining our opium revenue, so that the need for a substitute is sure to arise sooner or later, and hence the sooner permanent measures are taken the better.

4. The Sind Times (7), in its issue of the 23rd April, writes :—So long as men like Mr. Caine, Mr. Samuel Smith, and a number of tourist Members of Parliament of the same ilk confined their exploitation of India to publishing books full of nothing but crude notions of India, her people and customs, and political and social aspirations, we did not greatly object, nor did we consider it worth while noting their follies, both of speech and pen; but now that these faddists have managed to inoculate the House of Commons with their inanities, the time has come when every one who takes more than a theoretic interest in the welfare of India should unite in defence of imperilled institutions and revenue resources which immediately touch the pockets of Europeans and Natives alike. We have not before us the debate in the Commons which has resulted in the opium revenue system of India being challenged and condemned by a majority of thirty votes in a by-no-means full House,—indeed, in an assemblage under one-half the regular number making up the House. By what extraordinary mismanagement the Government should have allowed its opponents to score so substantial a victory we are not apprised; but evidently a surprise was sprung upon the Ministers when it was too late to provide an effectual remedy. In the result, the entire system of deriving a revenue from the cultivation of the poppy and the manufacture of the drug stands condemned, and all the pseudo-religious and pharisaically righteous faddists in Parliament are rejoicing exceedingly utterly oblivious of the fact that, if the Government of India was for a moment to take them and their temporary triumph altogether seriously and abandon the opium monopoly, the "poor down-trodden Natives," with whom they profess to be so greatly in sympathy, would have to be taxed tenfold what they are, in order to make good the loss of the six millions sterling which opium now brings to the Imperial exchequer. There is only one other remedy, and although it may savour of reprisals, in the last resort we trust it will be availed of, should these Parliamentary fanatics push matters through in regard to the opium monopoly abolition. We allude to the re-imposition of the abandoned cotton duties. The Government will be unfaithful to the trust confided to it, should it allow any form of taxation whatever to replace the revenue derived from opium. To do anything of the sort would justify almost any measures the people of India might in their righteous indignation be driven to adopt. To double or treble or quadruple the income-tax and make it more widely applicable to other sections and classes at present untouched by it, would raise a howl of discontent from one end of India to the other; whilst as concerns the salt tax, these very Parliamentary faddists are the very people who, time after time, attack the Indian Government for not still further reducing it,—indeed, they have before now urged its entire abolition as they are at present doing in the matter of the opium revenue, and yet if this latter goes by the board, it is quite plain that there will be no other alternative than to increase the salt duties and make the consumption of salt almost prohibitive. We submit that the Government is bound to disregard this vote of the House of Commons. There should be no hesitation out here, and at the India Office, in refusing to endorse such an idiotic decree, be the consequences what they may. As a protest from this side, the Governor-General in Council ought to declare the impracticability of the step urged upon it by the caucus which brought about this vote, and, in order to carry the war into the opponents' camp, proclaim the re-imposition of the cotton duties. This would probably bring Sir J. Pease and the faddists to their senses, whilst it would be a measure of retributive justice which every true friend of India would hail with rejoicing.

Anglo-Indian newspapers and the resolution passed in the House of Commons about the cultivation of opium in India.

5. The Phœnix (5), in its issue of the 22nd April, writes:—In connection with the motion of Sir J. Pease in the House of Commons regarding Indian opium revenue, we should like to say a word about the spirit in which it is being criticised by the leading Anglo-Indian papers. It is admitted that the measure is very embarrassing. There may be difference of opinion as regards the wisdom or the practical nature of the resolution, but there can be no justification for encouraging the Indian Government to treat the motion with contempt or ridicule. If the Government are put in a serious position they will explain their difficulty to Parliament, when, perhaps, the resolution may be reconsidered. But surely it is not for the Government to judge whether effect should be given to the motion or not. What would become of the constitution if the executive were to become the judges of the legislature? To say that the Government of India are at liberty to take any notice of the resolution of the House of Commons or not as they choose, is just the same thing as to maintain that a Magistrate or Judge has the option to carry out the Age of Consent Act. There must be Judges who think that the new Act is a bad measure, and if there is no physical violence there is no crime. Can they on that account disregard the law? The Government of India may not approve of the action of the House of Commons, as they certainly do not, but they cannot defy the wishes of the House. It seems to us very wonderful that a growing contempt for Parliamentary institutions is one of the marked traits of Anglo-Indian statesmanship. It is forgotten that Parliament is the secret of the strength and success of England, and defiance to it is to lay the axe at the root of the stability of the Empire. Anglo-Indian opinion seems to be so completely absorbed in the contemplation of the might and splendour of the English Government that it seems to have forgotten that Parliament has got the power to decide whether the British Indian Empire shall exist or not.

An enquiry into the present state of the home charges and the military expenditure considered necessary.

6. The Sudhárak (18), in its issue of the 27th April, writes:—There is no doubt that dark clouds are fast gathering on the financial horizon of India. With the opium revenue threatened, exchange going down, and small frontier wars on hand, the Government of India must surely not find its financial position very enviable. It is therefore absolutely necessary, in the interests of the financial solvency of this country, that Government, whether it likes the course or not, should take the earliest opportunity to appoint a commission to enquire into the present state of the home charges and the military expenditure. The National Congress too, which has hitherto shrunk from taking up these questions for consideration, must no longer shirk its duty in this direction. Of course, the military authorities in this country would oppose the appointment of the commission tooth and nail. A note of such opposition has been already sounded by Sir George Chesney in his farewell speech at Simla, where, speaking of Sir David Barbour's complaint that the military expenditure of the country is growing without limits, the retiring General thus delivered himself:—"In the piping times of peace, when all is quiet, the advocates of military forethought and military efficiency work under difficulties. What they deem prudence is dubbed military extravagance. They find themselves set down as alarmists. Financial considerations and the Bogie Man (the Finance Minister) get the upper hand." But the selfish protests of these good people must be no longer heeded by the Government of India, which, if the opium revenue is to be regarded as gone, may be said to stand on the verge of financial bankruptcy.

Remarks on the note issued to the district officers in Bengal about the working of the Age of Consent Act.

7. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 26th April, writes:—Evidently the Government of India feels the seriousness of the mistake it has committed in passing the Age of Consent Act almost without an amendment in the teeth of the public protest. The Governor-General in Council has deemed it necessary to address a special note to district officers in Bengal on the subject of the working of the Act for ensuring that "the provisions of the Act will be applied with due care and caution." The Government of India warns "the experienced officers to whom alone jurisdiction to enquire and commit for trial is left" not to take action "except on really trustworthy information brought by responsible persons who may reasonably be presumed to have a knowledge of the facts" and "that no mere suspicion will be held sufficient to set the law in motion." In case the Magistrate sees reason to distrust the truth of a complaint, he may under Section 202, Criminal Procedure Code, postpone the issue of process and either make an enquiry himself or direct a subordinate officer to make it. The Government thinks that it would be preferable to entrust this enquiry to some experienced Native Magistrate although the law allows such an investigation to be made by a police officer not lower in rank than an Inspector. Such a course, it is pointed out, would be more agreeable to the feelings of the people. On the whole, the higher officers are asked to watch the working of the Act and to report constantly upon it. We say this note is a very significant commentary on the contemptuous tone adopted by the various speakers on the occasion of the passing of the Act. The mind of the Governor-General is not at ease. He feels that by passing the Bill into an Act he has preserved the prestige of the Government, but, at the same time, inflicted a grievous wrong on the people. He would therefore rather have the Act remain a dead letter. [The Kesari (42), in its issue of the 28th April, expresses similar sentiments.]

8. Writing on the same subject, the Bombay Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 27th April, says:—The note addressed by the Government of India to the district officers in Bengal shows that in passing the Age of Consent Act the good of the public was desired, and must allay the fears entertained by the opponents of the Act that the measure would prove an instrument of annoyance to and persecution of innocent and respectable families. The order of the Government of India directing that the investigation, before issue of a summons, into a case coming under the Act should be entrusted to some experienced Native Magistrate will be read with much gratification, removing the objection taken to the Act by the opponents of the measure in their memorial to be submitted to Parliament that the new law would prove a source of annoyance to respectable families. The supporters of the law, however, ought to explain to their ignorant brethren the good intentions of the Government of India in passing the law and the precaution it has taken in enforcing its provisions, and should carefully watch how the Act is enforced. [The Jdme Jamshed (84) of the same date expresses similar sentiments.]

9. The Bhámini Prakásh (24), in its issue of the 29th April, observes :—

Writings against the Age of Consent Act.

The opponents of the Age of Consent Act, especially the editors of newspapers like the Shri Shivájí (63), the Poona Vaibhav (53) and some others, and authors of some novels and dramas continue to publish effusions calculated to excite the religious feelings of illiterate people by misrepresenting that the Government wish to destroy Hinduism. The consequences of such inflammatory writings might prove very serious, and hence Government should take timely notice of their authors by warning them to desist from the dangerous course.

10. The Nyáyadarshak (113), in its issue of the 27th April, observes :—

The Age of Consent Act and the Indian National Congress.

A majority of the people of Ahmedabad seem to entertain strong dislike for those reformers who supported the Age of Consent Bill, because, it is said, they have decided not to invite the latter to the meetings to be shortly held for electing delegates to the ensuing Indian National Congress, nor to elect any of them as delegates, nor to accept any of them to represent the city if they be elected at a meeting of the reformers.

11. The Mahratta (4), in its issue of the 26th April, writes :—Those who have dubbed themselves, to their own immense satisfaction, "the reformers excellence" often advise us to do this thing or abstain from doing that, and emphasize their words by exclaiming at the top of their voice "What will they think of you in England?" Evidently they have convinced themselves that the only way to our salvation as a nation lies in so adapting our manners and customs as to make them agreeable to English views. They will not allow our reformation to proceed on its own lines. They would divert, twist and turn it so as to run on English lines. They advise the opponents of the Consent Age Act to stop their agitation, and especially not to take it to England. For they warn us, "Englishmen will not be prepared to listen to you. To them the idea of marriage with a girl of ten or twelve will simply appear horrible, and they would kick a speaker off the platform if he were to put in a plea for such practices." But we fail to see the harm of asking Englishmen to help us to the abrogation of a law which breaks faith with the people, which has been passed against the protests of an overwhelming majority of the people, and which was required to be considerably amended even by those who called themselves its best supporters. We will ask Englishmen if "public opinion" is thus to be set aside, especially in such a delicate religious question, where our rulers are not likely to be cognisant of all its bearings. We will ask whether the solemn promise contained in the Queen's Proclamation not to interfere with the religious practices of the people is to be explained away so as to justify acts like the present one. We will ask Englishmen if they are prepared to set about modifying Indian manners and customs and religious practices with a light heart. English opinion can, at best, exercise an educative and persuasive effect upon us. It cannot and should not aim further than this. It ought not to try its hand at coercion as it has done in the recent instance. Already have the Hindus and Mahomedans become very sensitive. They have got seriously alarmed about the attitude of Government in regard to religious matters. A belief is gaining ground (and who will say that it is unreasonable?) that our morality will be judged by the English standard and condemned accordingly. The present attempt is only the thin end of the wedge. The new interpretation put upon the Magna Charta of India will cover much further interference than has already taken place, and the Viceroy has already given an invitation to our reformers to ask for more. The mischief of this is self-evident.

Advice given by social reformers not to carry the agitation against the Age of Consent Act to England, ridiculed.

12. The Gujarátí (81), in its issue of the 25th April, writes :—The Bengal Government have appointed an influential Commission, with Sir Henry Harrison as chairman, for enquiring into the condition of the "poor whites" in Calcutta. Its labours will be confined to the determination of the extent and nature of the poverty and destitution prevailing among Europeans and Eurasians in the metropolis, to ascertaining the number of charitable institutions and the amount of funds at their disposal for the relief of such destitution, and to devising remedial and preventive measures. It was only a few weeks ago that a meeting was convened at Calcutta, which was presided over, we believe, by the Archbishop and which sent a representation to Government on the subject. We do not envy the lot of the people in whose behalf the proposed enquiry has been so readily granted by Government. If the labours of the Commission result in improving the condition of such Europeans and Eurasians as are destitute and wretched without imposing any burden on the provincial exchequer, there would hardly be any room for feeling aggrieved. But what we do emphatically protest against is the differential treatment meted out to the representations made in the interests of the people of the soil. This contrast has been marked on several occasions. The representations of the various European Chambers of Commerce uniformly receive an amount of indulgent consideration, a hundredth part of which is not bestowed on petitions and memorials from Native associations. Take the recent instance of the manner in which the Indian Government dealt with the memorial addressed to them by the President of the sixth Indian National Congress. We have already commented upon the astounding arguments used in the reply of Government; but we must repeat our conviction that the Supreme Government would not have ventured to give such an answer to any of the Chambers of Commerce. Take again the resolutions adopted at successive meetings of the Congress during the last six years, inviting Government to consider the desirability of appointing a commission of enquiry into the industrial condition of the country. Have they done anything in this direction? Absolutely nothing. The poor whites of Calcutta are perhaps becoming increasingly poor, but are not our rulers aware that the poor rayat of India is also in a similar predicament? It is very solemnly urged by the Bengal Government that the proposed enquiry has an important bearing on the administration. If Government were disposed to be equally fair towards the rest of their subjects, it would be at once admitted that the "poor whites" are but an infinitesimal drop in the ocean as compared to the millions of the starving populations of India, and that the material prosperity or otherwise of this class is an infinitely more important factor in the administration than the well-being of the former class. During the régime of Lord Dufferin a half-hearted attempt was made to ascertain the material condition of one of the Indian provinces. Even the result of such a perfunctory investigation disclosed a disquieting tale. We do not think Government can afford to shut their eyes to the results of the last census. Sooner or later they will be compelled to grapple with the difficult problem that is staring them in the face. But it would be better if they took up the matter before things had grown intolerably worse. What is required is a thorough and exhaustive enquiry into the economical, industrial and agricultural condition of the country, to enable Government to deal with the question with some hopes of success. So long they have paid no heed to the recommendations made to them in this regard. People can hardly be blamed if they exclaim after hearing of the present Commission that, after all, "blood is thicker than water." Against this spirit of favouritism in the one case and cruel indifference in the other we again enter our strong protest, and before our rulers can justly claim the title of enlightened and generous rulers, they must get rid of this habit of mind which has not a little influenced the administration of the whole country. [The Hitechchhu (83) of Ahmedabad and the Satyavaktá (119), in their issues of the 30th April and 1st May respectively, express similar sentiments.]

Remarks in connection with the Commission appointed by the Bengal Government to enquire into the condition of "poor whites" in Calcutta.

Suggestions to His Excellency Lord Harris in connection with His Lordship's visits to district towns.

13. The Indu Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 27th April, writes:—His Excellency Lord Harris has been doing much useful work at the cost of personal discomfort in the way of his tours. He has visited since last cold weather a considerable part of the presidency under his rule. The object of such visits is that the head of the Government should make himself personally acquainted with local conditions. His Lordship has resolved to pay frequent visits to every district town. If these visits are to be really useful, let us suggest that they should be made less stately and more business-like. At present gubernatorial or Viceregal visits are regular royal progresses or State pageants, when everything is so ordered as to put on the best aspect.

There is a report current that when Lord Lytton visited Poona to see the famine works, the large majority of the worst famine-stricken people were expressly ordered to a safe distance out of the view of the Viceroy. We do not think such wilful suppression of unpleasant facts is made every time. But there is surely a general wish to keep out of sight unsightly things and to put on the best face. Even the temporary cleanliness and the attempt to put on holiday attire leave behind some solid gains, but such a frank and practical Governor as His Excellency Lord Harris could do greater good by stripping his visits of their stately appearance and by discouraging the inevitable address.

Reply of His Excellency the Governor to the Belgaum municipal address.

14. The Hindusthán (105), in its issue of the 26th April, says that His Excellency Lord Harris, in replying to the municipal address at Belgaum, gave useful and important advice that the addresses to be presented to high officials should contain not only the bright side of the picture but also the dark one. The paper observes that the District Collectors and other officials should pay due attention to this advice of His Excellency and not object to mention being made of the grievances and wants of the people in the addresses. [The Gujarát Darpan (80), in its issue of the same date, expresses similar sentiments.]

Remarks on the results of the recent High Court and District Pleaders' Examinations.

15. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 26th April, writes :—The results of the High Court and District Pleaders' Examinations have this year also proved to be extremely disappointing. In the higher examination only 2 passed out of 46, that is, about 4 per cent. In the lower examination only 8 passed out of 351, which gives a percentage of about 2⅓. It is really a shame that hundreds of students should thus be disappointed from year to year. It cannot be that the students go up without preparing themselves. There may be a few such. But a great many, we know, go up well prepared, so far as it is possible for them to be. It must be considered that matriculates are allowed to appear for the examination. It therefore follows that the powers that be consider the Matriculation standard as giving a sufficient general culture as well as particular knowledge of the English language. Why, then, should candidates who satisfy these tests fail year after year even after a preparation of three or four years? We know several young men whose future has been completely wrecked by reason of their following this will-o'-the-wisp. They gave the best half a dozen years of their life to this course and had ultimately to give it up. The standard of efficiency required varies with each examiner and from year to year. There is always a glorious uncertainty about the matter, which baffles and confounds the candidates most successfully. We are afraid that the systems of marking also differ; all this resulting in disappointment and loss of a large number of candidates. The Chief Justice of the High Court is said to possess the power of supervising and correcting the decision of the examiners. It is said that this power has rarely been exercised. We can understand how the Chief Justice would be loth to wound the feelings of these gentlemen by unnecessary interference. But when the future of no less than 343 young (some of them are elderly, if not old) men is concerned, such scruples ought not to come in the way of an enquiry into the matter. When we find that in spite of the very severe and vigorous results for several years past the number of candidates does not perceptibly fall—when we find that among the unsuccessful candidates there is a considerable number of young men who have been devoting the best part of their time and energy to their legal studies for three to five years—it is hard to conceive that the massacre of the innocents is due to their fault alone. We hope the High Court Judges will take this matter into their most serious consideration.

Remarks on the result of the recent District Pleaders' Examination.

16. The Dnyán Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 27th April, writes :—It is not right to say that out of 351 candidates who appeared at the recent examination for District Pleaders 9 only have passed, because it is said that of the 351 about 125 candidates only tried to answer the six question papers set at the examination. The result cannot be considered to be satisfactory even if the above be true. A reform in the system of the examination is urgently needed. We do not understand why the percentage of marks required for passing this examination has been fixed so high as 60, which is higher than that fixed for the LL.B. Examination. The percentage may be reduced to 50, and those who could secure 40 per cent. should be allowed to practise in Subordinate Judges' Courts, which are in sad want of pleaders. If the Honourable Judges of the High Court will favourably consider this suggestion, many candidates will be saved from the crushing disappointment which they meet with at present. The question papers set at this examination are generally so very lengthy that even the candidates who are well prepared and can write fast do not find sufficient time to answer all the questions. Another fault in the system is that there is no continuity in the standard of efficiency required. At this year's examination there were two questions carrying 20 marks in the Equity paper which were drawn from laws that have not been applied to the Bombay Presidency. [The Bakul (22), in its issue of the 26th April, says that instead of plucking such a large number of candidates every year it would be better to abolish the examination.]

Alleged causes of the startling results of the recent Pleaders' Examinations.

17. The Indu Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 27th April, writes:—The results of the last Pleaders' Examinations, in which 2 pass out of about 47 candidates in the higher, and 9 pass out of over 300 candidates in the lower, are really startling. At the first blush one is tempted to say that there must be something particularly wrong in these examinations, either the papers were excessively stiff or the examiners excessively severe. But there is a third contingency which seldom presents itself to the popular mind, and, in fact, is generally scornfully rejected. It is considered impossible that so many men could have come up for a professional examination without proper preparation. The opinion of some competent men who have acted as examiners and whom we have consulted is, however, that a large majority of the candidates are very badly prepared. The reason of this want of preparation is to be found in the absence of any systematic responsible training, such as a school or a college imparts. The men are mostly matriculated students, who hardly understand even the English of the law books they have to study, whose time is generally occupied in some service, and who are their own instructors in law as well as general habits and methods of work. The preparation of such men must needs be misdirected and raw, and largely contributes to the appalling number of failures at the examinations. An analogy to this number of failures is to be found in the class of candidates under private tuition at the Matriculation. There are some faults to be found in the ways of examiners too, which vary with individuals; but the chief cause of the failures is to be found in the absence of training, for which some remedy should be found.

Mr. Cooper's continuance in service as Chief Presidency Magistrate desired.

18. The Din Bandhu (9), in its issue of the 26th April, writes:—The rumour that our popular Chief Presidency Magistrate is going to retire shortly is, we think, unfounded. It would be better to have him for a few years more. Comparisons are, no doubt, odious, but if we say that at present there is only one Court, and that is the Chief Presidency Magistrate's, which is free from vagaries and where the procedure is strictly observed, we shall be reflecting the Native opinion. Mr. Cooper is still able enough to work, and to work very hard, and there is no reason why he should retire. [The Jagadhitechchhu (14), in its issue of the 25th April, also praises Mr. Cooper, and would not like Mr. Webb's appointment as Chief Presidency Magistrate.]

Suggestions for the appointment of a successor to Mr. Cooper, Chief Presidency Magistrate, Bombay.

19. In alluding to the same subject the Kásidé Mumbai (108), in its issue of the 29th April, says:—Mr. Crawley-Boevey, whose impartial and just decisions gave entire satisfaction to the people when he acted as Chief Presidency Magistrate, should be appointed in Mr. Cooper's place. If this arrangement cannot be made, Mr. Hamilton, who is also an able Magistrate, should be promoted to that post. Mr. Richardson, the Third Presidency Magistrate, to whom an extension of service has been recently granted, will, it is said, revert to his original appointment of Deputy Collector. If this occurs, a Mahomedan gentleman ought to be appointed to the Third Magistrate's post, as no Mahomedan has hitherto had a seat on the bench of the Presidency Police Court.

Appointment of a Native as Third Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, recommended.

20. The Din Bandhu (9), in its issue of the 26th April, writes:—We understand that Mr. W. C. Richardson, the sub. pro-tem. Third Presidency Magistrate, has been given one year's extension of service, but not as Third Presidency Magistrate. We have not as yet learnt who is to be his successor. We hope that His Excellency Lord Harris will see his way to appoint a Native gentleman of proper legal training to this post.

Remarks in connection with the extension of service allowed to Risáldár-Major Ahmad Husen of the Second Bombay Lancers.

21. The Pandit (151), in its issue of the 24th April, says:—In the month of May, Risáldár Rupsing, Native Aid-de-Camp to His Excellency the Governor, will revert to his regiment, the Second Bombay Lancers. Though Risáldár-Major Ahmad Husen of the same regiment has completed thirty-two years' service he has not been pensioned, and this has prejudiced the pecuniary and other interests of Risáldár Rupsing. The commanding officer of the Second Bombay Lancers and His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief ought to duly consider the Risáldár's case. Risáldár Rupsing has also completed thirty-two years' service and has a claim to the rank of Risáldár-Major, which he ought to get. If Risáldár-Major Ahmad Husen has been kept in service because he is to be rewarded with the first class Order of British India, it would be better to admit his claim to the order when it falls vacant even after he is pensioned. Thirteen officers of the Bombay Native Army have been given extensions of service after they have served thirty-two years, and thereby the prospects of sixty persons below them have been prejudiced.

Remarks in connection with the Rájábái Tower tragedy.

22. In alluding to the shocking fatality which had befallen two young Pársi ladies at the Rájábái Tower on the afternoon of Saturday the 25th April and the profound sensation caused by the sad event in Bombay, the Bombay Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 28th April, gives detailed information in connection with the occurrence and observes:—It has been surmised in several quarters that the fatality was the result of a mere accident and the police is believed to entertain a similar view, but the circumstances that have hitherto come to light appear to run counter to this supposition. It has not been proved whether both the ladies fell from the same window of the tower or from different windows of it. If their fall was from different windows, it is unreasonable to attribute the occurrence to mere accident. The bodies of the two deceased were examined by two Pársi doctors, who found external marks of violence on certain parts of the bodies in the form of scratches from finger-nails, and this opinion of the medical gentlemen has not been contradicted. The opinion of Dr. Smith, the Surgeon to the Coroner, would materially assist in the solution of the mystery about the scratches, but before its receipt a theory has been advanced by the police that the scratches were caused by the buttons on the jackets and the glass bangles worn by the deceased. This supposition of the police is not supported by facts, since the scratches caused by twisted buttons and broken bangles are quite different from those made by human nails. The buttons might have caused marks on the upper portions of the bodies, but similar marks on the lower parts of the bodies of both ladies cannot be assumed to have been made by the broken bangles. Under these circumstances, the mysterious deaths cannot be supposed to be the result of accident, and a searching enquiry by the police is desirable for the proper solution of the mystery.

23. The same paper, in another place, observes that the other theory that the two deceased committed suicide by taking leaps from the tower is also untenable, for the reasons that marks of finger-nails and other violence were found by two Pársi doctors on certain parts of the bodies of both the deceased, that both the ladies led a happy life at home, that when they left their home on the day of the accident they were in a pleasant and lively mood, that they were seen to pass through the streets in their usual joyful frame of mind, it being contrary to experience that in Native society at least persons bent on self-destruction assume a pleasant mood and gay appearance immediately before the commission of the deed, and that both the ladies were not heard to fall at the same time, but one fall was heard to have been succeeded by another after the lapse of a little time.

24. The same newspaper, in a third leader on the same subject, observes that the scratches believed to be caused by human nails on certain parts of the bodies of both the deceased ladies lead to the inference that they were the victims of indecent attack at the hands of one or more villains, to escape from whom and save their honour the ladies had jumped from an open window of the tower, or that they were deliberately thrown down by the ruffians. A large majority of the Pársi community believe this to be the right explanation of the mystery, and have expressed their sympathy for the family of the deceased by taking part in the funeral procession.

25. The same newspaper, in its issues of the 29th and 30th April and 1st and 2nd May, in addition to items of news, publishes reports and rumours in connection with the tragedy, notices further proofs in support of the theory of the deceased being indecently attacked in the tower before they threw themselves or were thrown out by the villains from one of the tower windows, and requests the police not to stick to its assumption of the tragedy being a simple accident, which indirect evidence shows to be not the case, and to prosecute enquiries upon the assumption that the deceased met with foul play.

26. The issues of the Jáme Jamshed (84) and the Akhbáre Soddgar (91) of this week also devote much of their space to publishing items of news, reports and rumours in connection with the catastrophe. The former, in its issues of the 28th and 29th April, refutes the supposition that the deceased committed suicide, and requests the police to find out a Pársi young man who was said to be on the tower in company of a Pársi girl of about ten years when the deceased visited the building. The Soddgar, in its issues of the 30th April and 1st May, states that the general opinion among the Pársis is that the deceased ladies met with foul play and were thrown from a tower window by the ruffians, who are believed to have made an indecent attack on them, and that the assumption that the deceased committed suicide is groundless.

Part II.—Education.

The new grants-in-aid rules approved and a recommendation made in the matter.

27. The Jáme Jamshed (84), in its issue of the 28th April, approves of the new rules for grants-in-aid that have come into operation from the 1st April, but observes that in order that the full benefit of these rules may be derived by private enterprise it is desirable that the educational authorities should give up insisting upon the proprietors of private schools to raise the fees charged in their institutions to the same amount as is levied in Government schools in order to make themselves eligible for receiving aid. The Jáme also remarks that it is not right to put indirect pressure on municipalities to give aid to private institutions, only when they have consented to raise the school fees to the extent mentioned above.

Rustication of some students of the Deccan College, Poona, for misbehaviour approved.

28. The Shri Shivdji (63), in its issue of the 24th April, approves of Mr. Selby, the Principal of the Deccan College, Poona, rusticating five college students for getting drunk and misbehaving themselves on the night of the performance of a drama recently given by them, saying that teachers and professors of other Educational Institutions should carefully watch the conduct of their students and duly punish delinquents. [The Kesari (42), in its issue of the 28th April, expresses similar sentiments.]

Part III.—Municipalities.

Mr. East and the Poona Municipality.

29. The Kesari (42), in its issue of the 28th April, says:—All lovers of truth will be glad to hear that Mr. East, the late Collector of Poona, who is an opponent of local self-government and entertains a strong bias against the Poona

City Municipality, will shortly retire on pension. The Dnyán Prakásh, in its last two issues, has fairly exposed Mr. East's mischievous conduct in the matter of the municipality. His machinations were exposed to public gaze in the letters which Ráo Sáheb Námjoshi published a few days ago. Three incorrect statements were made by Mr. East in his report, alleging neglect on the part of the municipality in recovering arrears of taxes, sudden increase in the amount of refunds of octroi duty, and the diminution of the octroi income. The paper then gives some figures and facts showing how Mr. East has misrepresented the actual state of things in these matters, and adds that if Mr. Grant, the Divisional Commissioner, had been aware of the recovery of Rs. 8,000 from the outstanding balances since the appointment of an elected president, his remarks on Mr. East's conduct would have been stronger than they are.

30. The Ahmedabad Times 89), in its issue of the 29th April, observes :—

A request to the Commissioner, N. D., to personally enquire into the working of the Ahmedabad Municipality.

The president and commissioners of the Ahmedabad Municipality publish garbled accounts of their proceedings and otherwise misguide the Commissioner, N. D., and Government, and that is the cause why local self-government has not found favour with the people of that city. If the Commissioner wants to ascertain the real feelings of the people about the working of the corporation he should ascertain them by personal enquiry with the people before submitting his report to Government, and if a similar procedure is followed in the case of other municipalities their real working will be ascertained.

31. The Gujarát Mitrá (82), in its issue of the 26th April, observes :—

The Surat Municipality and its educational expenditure.

The Surat Municipality committed a great blunder in opening an English school for girls and saddling itself with an annual expenditure of about Rs. 1,200 in connection therewith. The legitimate duty of the municipality is to promote primary education, and it would have been better if it had provided the existing Gujaráti girls' schools with better school accommodation and a sufficient number of teachers instead of incurring enormous expenditure for the sake of some ten girls that attend the English school. The people of Surat are not likely to send their daughters to this school. Of the five members of the School Board four have reported favourably, while the fifth, Mr. Manchhárám Ghelábhái, has made an adverse report on this institution. It is to be hoped that when the question for providing a permanent building, &c., for this school comes before the corporation, it will refuse sanction and order the abolition of the institution.

32. The Din Bandhu (9), in its issue of the 26th April, says that the toll levied at the Máhim causeway is most unjustifiable as it is imposed in contravention of an express condition in the agreement between Government and the first Lady Jamsetji, who contributed Rs. 45,000 for the construction of the bridge, that this injustice has been allowed to continue although it was pointed out to Government by the Commissioner, Northern Division, in a communication addressed to it in 1881. The paper advises cartmen, who are principally the sufferers in the matter, and the residents of Máhim and Bandora to memorialize Government on the subject.

Part IV.—Railways.

33. After lamenting the alleged unconcern of Parliament to the shortcomings and defects of the Indian administration, and

Grievances of the Native employés and third class passengers on the G. I. P. and Southern Maratha Railways after alluding to the rumoured corruption among the employés on the East Indian railway, the Sudhárak (18), in its issue of the 27th April, says :—The Native employés on the G. I. P. and Southern Marátha Railway lines receive wretched salaries, while Europeans employed on these railways are given exorbitant pay for services not very responsible or arduous. Moreover, the Native subordinates are made to do hard service, are fined in small sums for petty mistakes, are not allowed the weekly holiday, are not permitted to absent themselves from their work on other holidays, are not paid extra wages in the working season for overwork done by them, do not get either casual or privilege leave, are not paid compensation for mutilation while performing the Companies' work, and are not allowed superannuation pension. These subordinates are made to perform work for twelve hours at a time, and hence sometimes serious mistakes are made by them, causing heavy losses to the Companies. The treatment received by the third class passengers on these lines is also objectionable. Very often third class carriages are over-crowded; waiting rooms with proper protection from the rains are not to be found at several stations; drinking water is not timely served at certain stations; the carriages are not properly lighted, and retiring accommodation is wanting in carriages set apart for female passengers. It is also desirable that an intermediate class between the second and the third classes should be created or the second class fare should be reduced to double the third class fare. The above complaints of the Native employés and passengers will, it is hoped, be enquired into and removed by Government.

A complaint regarding inconvenience to passengers on the Southern Marátha Railway.

34. The Vártáhar (19), in its issue of the 26th April, complains that much inconvenience is suffered by Native passengers at the Vathár station on the Southern Marátha Railway, as they are said to be driven out of the station into the scorching sun as soon as they get out of the train, for the accommodation and comfort of European passengers who generally alight at this place for proceeding to Mahábaleshvar during the hot months.

Part V.—Native States.

Remarks in connection with the occupation of Manipur by British troops.

35. In alluding to the occupation of Manipur by British troops and the escape of the Mahárája and the Jubráj, the Bombay Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 1st May, says:—It is to be much regretted that the Jubráj, who ordered the massacre of British officers, should have escaped, and we hope that he will be soon caught and visited with the condign punishment he deserves for his inhuman deed. The representation made by the Mahárája to the British authorities that he had no hand in the massacre and was unable to prevent it looks probably true, since he was raised to the gádi by the Jubráj, who was very powerful, and that the latter alone had raised the disturbances. For the due preservation of British prestige the cruel Jubráj ought to be traced to his lair and brought to receive the doom of a murderer that he so well deserves.

Mr. Quinton's conduct in carrying out the object of the Manipur Mission and the subsequent behaviour of the Manipuris.

36. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 26th April, writes:—There now and then comes a rude awakening, as we unfortunately have had in Manipur. According to the account of one of the eye-witnesses, the primary attack on the Jubráj's house was so unjustifiable as to have elicited a frank apology from Mr. Quinton. Now what shall we ascribe this to? What is still more inexplicable, except on the alternative hypothesis we have suggested above, is the late lamented Commissioner having ordered such an unprovoked attack, and had the inexcusable temerity (shall we use the expression?) to walk with a walking stick in hand into the enemy's palace, as if to a friend's bungalow to whom he had never given the slightest cause for offence. We have not the least wish to seem to justify or extenuate the serious and culpable nature of what followed, but we cannot help remarking that the uncivilized Manipuris must have been more than human, at least much more refined, than Mr. Quinton knew them, or ought to have known them to be, to receive that high officer with open arms. There is no doubt, however, that the Jubráj, in doing away, or permitting to do away, with the lives of the prisoners, has lost the only chance he had in his favour; but in doing so he has acted as an officer of ordinary prudence and experience ought to have expected him to do. We do not quarrel with the axiom of imperial policy laid down by a Bombay Anglo-Indian daily, that it cannot be tolerated for a moment that a feudatory should defy the orders, whether just or unjust, of an accredited agent of the Paramount Power; but we venture to suggest that it should be also taken into consideration how far a feudatory prince of the type of the Manipur Jubráj has control over the actions of his people or even officers.

37. Alluding to the outbreak at Manipur, the Shri Shivdji (63), in its issue of the 24th April, observes:—Government should in no way endanger the State or the liberty of its people in revenge for the blood of high Government officials, since the fault does not rest with the people or with their ex-king, who has already sought the protection of Government. The usurper and some of his accomplices are alone responsible for what has happened and deserve heavy punishment. Government should pursue the same policy as was adopted by the Government of Lord Northbrook when an attempt was said to have been made by a Native Chief to put to death an officer of Government, as there is little difference between the two cases.

Observations on the Manipur disturbances.

38. The Káthiáwár Times (3), in its issue of the 25th April, writes:—It would seem that the work of reforming Káthiáwár was reserved for His Excellency Lord Harris, who, we have very good reasons to believe, pays careful attention to what passes in this province. His Excellency, we understand, has issued a resolution forbidding all servants of the Political Agency from occupying darbári utárás and accepting darbári hospitalities during their sojourn in Native States whilst travelling with the Political Agent or his Assistants. A copy of the resolution not being before us, we regret we are unable to thank adequately His Excellency for initiating reforms in this province, slowly though surely. His Excellency will be better able to initiate reforms in this province by instituting an Editor's Table at Rájkot, for then the Káthiáwár Times would be better able to help His Excellency in the good work he has commenced.

39. In alluding to the dismissal of Mr. Rághav Khavás from service by His Highness the Jám of Jámnagar, the Gujaráti (81), in its issue of the 26th April, observes:—This State produces a handsome revenue, but its affairs are mismanaged by the Jám, his Diván, Mr. Rághav Khavás and the Ránis, each of whom strives to have everything in his own way and to revoke the orders issued by others. Such mismanagement can never lead to good results and at present fills the pockets of some of the State servants and increases the State liabilities. Some of the Political Agents made futile attempts to improve the administration of this State. Mr. Ollivant, however, is an experienced and energetic officer, and it is to be hoped that he will make due efforts to improve the State and will achieve success.

Remarks on the dismissal of Mr. Rághav Khavás from Jámnagar and a request to the Political Agent, Káthiáwár.

40. A correspondent of the Nyáyadarshak (113), in its issue of the 27th April, observes:—The dismissal of Mr. Rághav Khavás from the service of the Jám is to be greatly regretted, as he has rendered valuable services both to the State and its people. His dismissal is probably due to the intrigues of those persons who are trying to secure a Diván who is not a Hindu. Some of the leading citizens of Jámnagar are thinking of waiting upon His Highness the Jám in order to request him to reinstate Mr. Rághav Khavás, as the latter's removal will deprive the heir-apparent, Prince Jaswat Singhji, of one of the most faithful and trusted advisers, and will enable the enemies of the young Prince to import some non-Hindus into the State and to create dissensions between the Jám and his family.

The Pramod Sindhu (1), in its issue of the 24th April, writes:—Berár is groaning under a heavy pressure of multitudinous taxes; it is day by day losing hopes and energy on account of the deplorable state of its agriculture; it is being driven to despair by the restrictions put upon the cutting of firewood and grazing of cattle. The thought of a new tax on agriculturists is entertained with horror and alarm. In the opinion of the aggrieved people there is nobody to redeem them from their misery. It is to be deeply regretted that there should be none to advance the prosperity of the people. This thing, of course, cannot be done in a twinkle. To attain it the people will have to work continuously for a long time with combined efforts. They must remember that their protests will often be ineffectual; but they must not forget that their hearty and continuous efforts for the good of their province will sooner or later be crowned with success. They should represent their grievances to Government in a proper form.

Alleged wretched condition of the people of Berár.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ā) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Remarks in connection with the Anglo-Portuguese Treaty.

1. The Anglo-Lusitano (156), in its issue of the 30th April, writes:—The denunciation by England of the Anglo-Portuguese Treaty continues to seriously engage the attention of the public in India; and the grave incidents which daily straiten the relations between the two contracting nations, make the future prospects in this matter still more doubtful. The treaty has proved disastrous to Portuguese interests, but it has also not satisfied the aspirations of the British Government, as was affirmed by Sir James Fergusson in the House of Commons. After describing the losses brought about by the treaty, the Anglo-Lusitano says that it is believed that the British Government entertain a desire to renew the treaty with the alteration of certain clauses, which, it appears, are for the greater part those that are exactly most prejudicial to the interests of the Portuguese Government. The alterations will, therefore, tend to further aggravate matters. It is necessary, therefore, that the Portuguese Government should maintain a firm attitude in this important negotiation, and not sacrifice so important and glorious a possession as Portuguese India to the interests of its African possessions.

2. The Mahratta (4), in its issue of the 3rd May, says:—Rumours are persistently spread in England to the effect that His Excellency Lord Lansdowne has communicated his wish to Lord Cross to be relieved of the responsibilities of his office as early as possible. It is said that the Manipur embroglio and catastrophe are the direct result of the orders given to Mr. Quinton by the Supreme Government. It is averred, with what truth we are unable to say, that Mr. Quinton would have taken with him a larger escort but for definite orders to the contrary. Manipur must be causing Lord Lansdowne considerable anxiety, which he must find it hard to bear in this trying season. Then, again, we cannot help feeling that His Lordship must have been painfully surprised by the amount of opposition the Scoble Bill met with from all parts of the country. His Lordship passed the measure, no doubt, but, all the same, in his own heart he must have felt appalled at the outrage he was going to do to the feelings of almost the whole nation. The recent resolution of Government about the execution of the Act points in the same direction. Therein Lord Lansdowne has made an attempt to satisfy his own conscience. On the whole, therefore, we are not surprised to hear that His Lordship feels unable to bear the heavy strain of his duties.

No fresh taxation is considered necessary to recoup the treasury if the opium monopoly is abolished.

3. The Kaiser-i-Hind (85), in its issue of the 3rd May, writes:—The momentary defeat which the Ministers received the other day in regard to the motion of Sir J. Pease for the abolition of the opium monopoly of the Government of India has led to a prolonged wail all over India. Publicists, official and non-official, have begun to write about it in a spirit of alarm, as if the deluge were near at hand. That alarm, in its turn, has caught hold of the unthinking masses, with the net result that everybody is blankly contemplating the new burdens which are supposed to be in store for them in the immediate future in consequence of the passing of Sir Joseph's resolution. The Anti-Opium Society has been crying hoarse over its so-called "fad" these last fifteen years. It has hitherto cried in vain. Only a fortuitous circumstance has enabled it to get its resolution passed this year. That it is academical and would not be acted upon goes without saying. But what the public has to ask is this. Suppose that no such resolution had been passed, could that have affected in the least the declining fortunes of opium? The reply must emphatically be in the negative. Have they not before them the facts of the past twelve years to guide them in spite of the agitation of Sir J. Pease and his friends, and to frame their annual estimates in sympathy with the steady decline? They are aware that the growth of opium in China is going on at railway speed. Every year shows a diminution of the Indian revenue. We have already observed that it is worse off by 3 krors in twelve years. But has the Government of India hitherto ventured to propose new taxation or enhancement of old taxes on this account? The income-tax and the increased duty on salt have, certainly, not been imposed on account of the diminishing opium revenue. It is notorious that the former owed its origin to the conquest of Upper Burmah, and the latter to the temporary embarrassment caused by a fall in the value of silver. They are the woful legacies of Lord Dufferin's disastrous administration. If then the Government has not ventured, because it could not venture, to demand new or additional taxation for the decline in the opium revenue during the last twelve years, why should the public anticipate new taxes in the near future for an annual decline of 25 or even 50 lákhs, when that revenue is more than made up by the growth in the other sources of receipts? We contend that the apprehension is an unreasonable one. If taxes are raised, it will, certainly, not be on account of opium, but for the Government of India's fatal policy of extending its frontiers east and west, and mounting up its military expenditure at the rate of a million in the last five years. The Government has all along been able to balance the yearly decline of ¼ kror in the opium revenue by more than that amount in the growth of other branches of revenue, especially excise. It may not be uninteresting to state here that, while opium has declined 3 krors in twelve years, excise has gone up 1¾ krors in the same interval. It has risen from 2 to 3¾ krors and is destined soon to grow more, despite the agitation of the temperance organisations and the just anathemas of Messrs. Smith and Caine—thanks to the double policy to which Bright alluded thirty-eight years ago. Barring the appalling military and civil expenditure, the finances of India are so far satisfactory that the Government could easily balance its annual budget and have a surplus of 1½ krors for famine purposes, besides remitting the extra duty on salt and meeting losses by exchange at the rate of 1*s.* 4½*d.* Those who care to dive deep into Indian finances may discover all these facts for themselves. It is simply an interested cry which says that there will be a burdensome additional taxation,—the cry of the official bureaucracy who know how much less they will have to spend when the opium revenue is gone. We should like to see how Government would dare face the indignation which might be hurled at it in case it should be so ill-advised as to demand new taxes because the opium traffic was ordered to be stopped at once,—a contingency which must be summarily discounted, because only lunatics could be expected to believe in it.

Disapproval of the resolution passed by the House of Commons against the opium traffic in India.

4. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 7th May, writes:—It is satisfactory to know that Mr. Maclean, M.P., has set his face against the abolition of the opium revenue. Indeed, it is an unmitigated wrong to force poison down the throats of a nation rightly or wrongly, but we cannot afford to believe that the Chinaman's vice originated with the Englishman. The Chinaman will have his craving for opium gratified, be the supplier India or any other country. Why should India give up her revenue when even by its abolition the Chinaman's redemption is almost impossible? Touching the same subject, Mr. Gladstone, while leaving aside the consideration of the morality or otherwise of the question, pointedly hints that the British tax-payer will repel with indignation any fresh levy on him to make up India's loss. This declaration from one of the foremost British statesmen ought to open the eyes of those members of the House of Commons who, in siding with Sir Joseph Pease, were simply laying themselves open to the charge of ignorance. Mr. Gladstone is cautious enough to keep in the background the question of abolition, though at the same time refusing to pledge the British tax-payer to a pecuniary indemnity. Thus the dream of a subsidy being exploded, the chief question is how to make up the gap. There is only one alternative, that proposed by the "Friend of China"—an increased employment of the Native agency in every department of the Indian administration. The suggestion is, indeed, worthy of consideration; but look at the strange spectacle of a Government putting forth every effort for the comfort and happiness of a foreign people at the expense of those of its own! Is the duty on salt, carrying disease and sickness into the household of every poor man, right? But that is no concern of the Government. The land tax is crushing down the people, but the Government will not mind it, because the system of inter-communication and the system of irrigation will enrich the otherwise poor cultivator. The forest law takes away every fertilising element from the soil; no, the husbandman must rely on his own hook for manure. Increasing ábkári revenue is increasing drunkenness; no, the excise is increased with a view to control the sale of liquors! Thus Government has time on hand to look into the grievances of the Chinaman, but has none to look into those of its own people. Indeed, the realities of actual life are stranger than romance!

5. The Din Mani (78), in its issue of the 5th May, observes:—The Parliamentary resolution on the opium question has caused widespread dissatisfaction among the Anglo-Indians, as it means nothing less than the imposition of new taxes. The Anglo-Indians are now likely to sympathise with the Natives, who are much disappointed at the improper refusal of Government to reduce the salt duties.

6. The Duyánodayá (11), in its issue of the 7th May, writes:—The committee appointed at the recent anti-opium meeting in Bombay to arrange for a permanent organization, to be called the "Bombay Anti-Opium Alliance," has already met and will soon be ready to report the principles and basis of action of the new organisation. It is very fortunate for the alliance that it has the cordial support and co-operation of the Bishop of Bombay. It may be a long time before the Government of India will yield to the pressure which the awakening conscience of England is beginning to exert, but it will have to yield some time, and the greater the agitation against the iniquitous opium revenue, the sooner that day will come.

Proposed establishment of a "Bombay Anti-Opium Alliance" and its alleged bright prospects.

7. The Gujarátí (81), in its issue of the 3rd May, writes:—The Honourable Sir George Chesney, K.C.B., Military Member of Council, was entertained at the United Service Club on the occasion of his departure from India. He naturally seized this opportunity for descanting on the virtues of the Military Department, and to appeal to public opinion for supporting the interminable schemes of that department as against the Financial Department. Now, is it really a fact that the bogie man triumphs over the Military Department, and is it really the case that the latter has been so wofully starved as to necessitate this appeal for public support as against Sir David Barbour? The following figures will show how military expenditure has gone on increasing during the last thirty years:—

Sir George Chesney on the military expenditure of India.

Civil Expenditure.		Military Expenditure.
1872-73... ...	£9,575,357	1857	£11,463,000
1882-83... ...	£11,038,504	1867	£16,748,220
1889-90	£15,309,900	1876	£15,308,460
		1889	£20,000,000

From the above it will be perceived that the military expenditure in 1876 equalled the civil expenditure in 1889-90, and that the military expenditure in 1889, which has since considerably increased, very nearly absorbed the total land-revenue. Does this show that the Bogie man has got the better of the Military Department or the reverse? The truth of the matter is that the Military Department has recently been so much fondled that it has come to regard its own interests as paramount to those of the other branches of the Indian administration. The country is already groaning under the weight of taxation, and the protagonists of the forward policy forget that the very existence and efficiency of their department are dependent upon the prosperity of the people at large. It has grown oblivious of the fact that the Financial Department has to safeguard the interests of the whole Indian Empire and not of one uncontrolled department alone. It may be, as Sir George Chesney has said, that India is held by the sword, but we may frankly tell him that even the mighty sword of England will not always find it easy to govern in peace 300 millions of human beings for all time, if people become dissatisfied and discontented. We hardly think it prudent for highly placed and distinguished officers to allude in a defiant tone to this argumentum ad aguem, and we are disposed to echo with our contemporary of the Bombay Gazette Lord Derby's words of profound wisdom that "our best defences in India are a full treasury and a contented people."

8. The Gujarát Darpan (80), in its issue of the 3rd May, writes:—A discontented India is a more terrible army than any which Sir G. Chesney or Sir F. Roberts can ever dream of for the great day of trial. An extravagant military policy as that advocated by General Chesney is sure to make India uneasy. In fact, the military heads are the bogie men of the whole of India and they raise a new bogie on the frontiers of India. Instead of the last word resting with such bogie men, they should be the last persons who may be allowed any vote in the financial administration. The Finance Minister, however, acts as their bogie man, as Sir G. Chesney playfully referred to him. General Chesney's reference to his honourable colleague is sure to draw attention to the fact that the Simla military clique do not allow Sir D. Barbour an easy hour of it. Should not the financial reformers make protests against the blind extravagance on the army and thus strengthen the hands of the Finance Minister? It is only when the notion that India is held by the sword will be got rid of from the minds of the heads of the army that we can expect to have a remission of taxation. Else the grinding mill will do its work and crush the tax-payers till the Government will be rudely awakened from their sleep.

Condition of the rayats in Native States compared with that of British subjects.

9. Alluding to the report recently submitted to His Highness the Nizám's Government by the committee appointed to enquire into the grievances of the agricultural classes of the Hyderabad State, and to the intention of His Highness' Government to carry out some of the suggestions made in that document, the Arunodayá (20), in its issue of the 3rd May, observes:—The people in Native States are more happy than the British Indian subjects, as Native rulers attend to the welfare of their rayats, while the British authorities try to squeeze out of their subjects the largest amount of revenue. English officers are proud of their administration, but they will be convinced of their wrong impression if they compare the condition of the farmers under their rule with that of the Nizám's rayats. If the English officers take a lesson from Sir Asman Jah in the art of government, their rule is sure to prove beneficial to the people. The people of India are assured that their country will be handed over to them when they are able to govern themselves, but this promise is not likely to be fulfilled.

Remarks on the appointment of a commission to enquire into the condition of the European and Eurasian communities of Calcutta.

10. The Din Mani (78), in its issue of the 5th May, says that the commission appointed to enquire into the condition of the European and Eurasian communities at Calcutta indicates that the British Government take a fatherly interest in these people, while a similar feeling is not entertained in the case of the natives of the country, who, it must not be supposed, are indifferent to this fact, and the Government ought to bear in mind that sooner or later the consequences of the neglect of the Native interests will be serious.

Comments on the circular issued by the Government of India in connection with the working of the Age of Consent Act.

11. The Dnyán Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 4th May, writes:—It is a somewhat curious procedure for the Executive Government to attempt to regulate the operation of the law by means of executive orders or instructions to the magistracy, instead of leaving that duty to the administrators of law. It was quite competent for the Executive Government to introduce the needful changes in the Bill when it was under the consideration of the Legislature. Their not having done so at the time and their having found it necessary, within a week after the enactment of the legislative measure, to materially modify the executive orders to the magistracy, is, in itself, the best possible proof, at any rate of the careless disregard, from the practical administrator's point of view, of the feelings, prejudices and even idiosyncracies of the people to be affected by the legislative measure. The instructions that no action shall be taken except on really trustworthy information brought by responsible persons who may be reasonably presumed to have knowledge of the facts they assert to have occurred, and that no mere suspicion shall be held sufficient to set the law in motion, must, if it be given effect to in an ungrudging spirit, result in practically depriving the District Magistrate of his jurisdiction to take cognizance of the offence under Section 191, clauses (b) and (c); while the simple fact that the complainant must be some "responsible" person, who may be reasonably presumed to have knowledge of the facts he asserts to have occurred, must naturally result in excluding all persons except the girl-wife herself and her natural or legal guardians. Moreover, it is worthy of note that where the girl-wife herself is either an active or even a passive participator in the offence, and where the illegal sexual intercourse has not resulted in any serious injury to her, there is not the slightest chance of herself or of any of her natural or legal guardians coming forward to prefer a complaint. In short, the instructions, if they are given effect to in a loyal and ungrudging spirit by those for whose behoof they have been issued, may be regarded as having practically sealed the fate of the new legislative measure, which was passed only six weeks ago with enthusiastic cheers and congratulations from those who have taken upon themselves to reform the Hindu community in spite of its own efforts to the contrary. There is one more observation which we should like to make in connection with the Government of India's letter. It would seem that similar letters have not been addressed by the Government of India to any other Provincial Government than Bengal; and, if our surmise be correct, the omission is very significant, indeed, in more ways than one.

12. The Káthiáwár Times (3), in its issue of the 1st May, writes:—The recent circular addressed by the Government of India to local Governments on the Age of Consent Act will go to remove some objections to the law, if it is acted up in the spirit in which it is drafted. It would make the law much harmless in its operation if it is faithfully put into practice. This circular is in ratification of the assurance given by Government for watching the operation of the law. It practically amends the Code of Criminal Procedure, and had the instructions contained in the circular been embodied in the Code they would have served the purpose much better. The instructions in the circular go a good deal to minimise the evils of the law; but the necessity for such a circular proves beyond dispute that, in the opinion of the Government itself, the law, as passed, is very imperfect and defective. [The Kaiser-i-Hind (85) of the 3rd May and the Ahmedabad Times (89) of the 6th idem express similar sentiments.]

13. In alluding to the resolution passed at a private meeting recently held at Poona to use indigenous productions in lieu of Europe cotton and woollen cloth, the Poona Vaibhav (53), in its issue of the 3rd May, in a long rambling leader, praises the meeting for its patriotic effort to benefit their native country, observes that this praiseworthy movement is not confined to Poona, but has extended to Baroda, Bombay, Belgaum, Sátára, Kolhápur and several other places, but that it is to be noticed with regret that the social reformers, who are worse than the low, shameless and avaricious persons who pandered to the immoral and indecent vices of Peshwa Bájiráo II (making a few indelicate allusions to Bájiráo's dirty practices), are trying to dissuade patriotic persons from using indigenous goods, but these good people should not listen to the evil advice of the reformers, who are so foolish and stupid as not to have seen through the artifices and devices of Government to expose the folly, shamelessness and unworthiness of the Natives, and to have supported the Age of Consent Bill that would cause undesirable interference with the Hindu social customs and would expose their womankind to insults and indecent examination at the hands of the police, medical men and the magistracy, and remarks that the people should, in protest of this harassing and unpopular law, eschew the use of Europe cloth, supplying its place with indigenous manufactures.

An exhortation to Natives to use indigenous cloth and a condemnation of the social reformers.

14. The Sudhárak (18), in its issue of the 4th May, writes:—We learn on very reliable authority that letters have been sent by some good Poona folks to friends in the mofussil asking them not to attend this year's Conference at all, or, if they attend, to insist on recording a protest against the Age of Consent Act before proceeding to any other business. Were it not for the fact that our source is trustworthy, we should have refused to believe that any respectable person could grow so utterly reckless and regardless of public interests as to take the step we have referred to above. All sorts of wild theories, however, are at present being preached in Poona, and if the coming Conference ends in a fiasco, that will be the first triumph of these theorists. It is almost staggering to think that, for a mere difference of opinion, some persons, who ought to know better, should be prepared to let loose forces of destruction on useful public institutions. If we are not ready to tolerate and even welcome difference of opinion in the discussion of public questions, all our boasted advance is really little better than a sham, and it is in vain to expect that people possessed of self-respect will long care to devote their time and attention to the discharge of public duties.

15. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 7th May, says:—A rumour has gained general currency to the effect that it is seriously contemplated by some to ask the Conference to enter a vigorous protest against the Age of Consent Act. We hope the body will do nothing of the kind. We hold that it will be very impolitic to introduce this bone of contention into the proceedings of the Conference. It is a subject outside its pale, as well as out of the cognizance of the Indian National Congress. Moreover, it is one on which people are hopelessly at variance. Although we have been opposed to this piece of legislation from the beginning, we hold that the Conference will mar its prospects if it allows this subject, and for the matter of that any social question, to be introduced before it. The Congress did well in thwarting the attempt to bring before it such questions, and the Conference must follow in its footsteps.

16. The Poona Vaibhav (53) and the Kesari (42), in their issues of the 3rd and 5th May, respectively, exhort the people of the Bombay Presidency to take particular good care that none of the social reformers who supported the Age of Consent Bill and advised Government to disregard public opinion when legislating on social matters, and who want to force upon the people all sorts of social reforms with the help of Government, are elected as their delegates at this year's Provincial Conference and to publicly disavow their leadership in social matters. The Poona Vaibhav advises that the Conference should protest against the Age of Consent Act. [The Dnyán Prakásh (12) of the 4th May disapproves of the suggestion that the Provincial Conference should protest against the Age of Consent Act, as the people are, it says, hopelessly at variance on the subject.]

Denunciation of the social reformers as the enemies of the country.

17. In a communicated article, the Poona Vaibhav (53), in its issue of the 3rd May, observes that the social reformers are the enemies of the country and should not only be outcasted but driven out of the Indian National Congress by the orthodox Hindus, who should inform Government that whatever is done by the reformers is not acceptable to the orthodox, whose number is considerably larger than that of the reformers.

Attributes the recent riots at Benares to the indiscretion of social reformers.

18. The same newspaper says that the recent riots at Benares in connection with the water-works were caused by the social reformers in the municipal corporation resolving to pull down a temple in the face of an extensive strong opposition from the orthodox, and advises the masses to keep themselves aloof from the reformers, as they are mean and dangerous like carnivorous animals and venomous insects.

Remarks on the visit of His Excellency Lord Harris to Jámnagar.

19. The Hitechchhu (83) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 7th May, observes:—The tours of Viceroys and Governors ought to benefit the places visited by them, but they have of late become a source of new burdens to the people, particularly to the subjects of Native States. These high functionaries do not care to enquire into the real condition of the Native States and are favourably impressed with the grand shows held in their honour. But these expensive receptions become a source of evil, inasmuch as new taxes are said to be levied to repay the expenses incurred upon them. Such a thing has, we believe, happened in Jámnagar in connection with the recent visit of His Excellency Lord Harris to that State. His Highness the Jám is a mere tool in the hands of Mr. Rághav Khavás, who has grown fat upon the State. The gubernatorial visits are believed to contribute to fill the pockets of unscrupulous officials of a Native State, as the whole of the proceeds of the newly imposed taxes sometimes do not find their way to the State treasury. The Jámnagar treasury is already in straitened circumstances, and it is to be regretted that His Highness the Jám should not look personally into his own affairs. If His Excellency Lord Harris cares to leave a good name behind him, he should have the taxes imposed on account of his visit withdrawn.

Evening parties given to departing Government servants disapproved.

20. The Ahmedabad Times (89), in its issue of the 6th May, observes:—It is a wise resolution that forbids Government servants from receiving addresses, but the evils arising from evening parties given by his subordinates in honour of a departing officer by subscriptions raised among themselves, are not less serious than those proceeding from valedictory addresses, as those who do not subscribe to the fund incur the displeasure of the departing officer, and we request Government to prevent officials from receiving evening parties in their honour.

The new rule promulgated by the Bombay High Court, authorising the Court to allot pleaders to particular districts, disapproved.

21. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 3rd May, says:—Last Thursday's Government Gazette promulgates a rule passed by the Bombay High Court to the effect that a person who has passed a District Pleaders' Examination or one who has passed the High Court Pleaders' Examination wishes to practise in the Courts of any one district, he will on payment of a fee of Rs. 5 get a sanad, not for the district he applies for, but for such district as the High Court may think fit. This rule is very harsh. There is no reason why the liberty of choosing the field of labour hitherto enjoyed should be withdrawn, as the withdrawal will undoubtedly destroy the independence of the profession. Success in the line of pleadership depends, apart from personal abilities, upon local connections. No such rule obtains in the case of barristers, who are sure to be much handicapped if they are not allowed to go where they think they have the best chance either through acquaintance or local connections, and are sent to places chosen by the Inns of Courts. If the rule promulgated by the High Court is intended to relieve the overcrowding of the bar in several districts and to recruit that which may be undermanned, the reason is not sound. If a pleader finds that he is unable to get on well, he in his own interests gets his sanad of the place cancelled and obtains one for another district where he thinks he may have better prospects. Thus re-adjustment goes on spontaneously. The High Court must be moved to cancel this rule without delay, and it is to be hoped that the district pleaders and candidates led by the Pleaders' Association in Western India will retain counsel to fight for annulling it. [The Kesari (42) of the 5th and the Dnyán Prakásh (12) of the 7th May also consider the new rule to be unjust and oppressive for reasons similar to those advanced by the Native Opinion. If the rule, adds the Dnyán Prakásh, is an old one, as it is said to be, and the permission of the Judge of the district for which a sanad was applied for was only nominal, there was no need for the republication of the rule, which, it is hoped, will not be enforced.]

Remarks on a decision of the Judges of the High Court of Bombay.

22. In alluding to the decision passed last year by the Bombay High Court on an appeal preferred by a certain Inámdár who claimed the juice of toddy trees growing in his Inám village by virtue of an old sanad, the Shri Shivájí (63), in its issue of the 1st May, says that the learned Judges who disposed of the appeal disallowed the appellant's claim to the juice on the ground that the sanad gave him the trees only and not the juice of those trees, but this interpretation of the sanad is to be much regretted, since the principle laid down in the decision is dangerous to property rights of all kinds. The Inámdárs particularly should take timely steps to protect their rights and privileges.

Alleged strange view of criminal trespass taken by a Presidency Magistrate at Calcutta.

23. In alluding to the judgment passed by Mr. Sayad Amir Hussen, one of the Presidency Magistrates at Calcutta, that the police of that city was justified in arresting the complainant, one Mitter, a clerk in the Telegraph Office, and marching him off to the thána, as in creating a disturbance at a public meeting at which Sir Andrew

Scoble presided and Bábu Kálicharan Bánerji delivered a lecture, he had committed criminal trespass punishable under Section 488 of the Indian Penal Code, the Phœnix (5), in its issue of the 29th April, says:—We have not heard of any case in which a disturber at a public meeting was ever marched off to a police station or taken before a Magistrate. The utmost that is done in such cases is to ask him to desist, and if he still persists, to simply remove him from the premises. This, we believe, is consistent with English law and, certainly, with common sense. The Magistrate has, no doubt, been carried away by the idea that Sir Andrew Scoble was "a high official of the Government of India." But the law admits of no such interpretation based upon distinctions of rank or position. What is not intentional insult to another cannot become such when applied to "a high official." The effect of this decision is far-reaching, and, if maintained, will considerably restrict the freedom of speech exercised at public meetings. The case may go to the High Court and we shall watch the result with interest. [The Káthiáwár Times (3) of the 4th May expresses similar sentiments.]

Complaint about the injury caused by boars to crops and human life in the Mával Táluka of the Poona District.

24. The Poona Vaibhav (53), in its issue of the 3rd May, says:—Wild hogs have become a great nuisance in the Mával Táluka of the Poona District. Hitherto these animals confined their inroads to the destruction of standing crops, but of late they have taken to attack human beings. A man has been brought into Poona who has been seriously injured by a boar. This evil has arisen from Natives being disarmed. If Government has any regard for its subjects, the latter should be allowed to possess weapons for the due protection of their lives and property against the attacks of wild animals. Government seem to distrust the loyalty of its Native subjects, but it is to be hoped that this suspicion will not come in the way of permission being granted to Natives to carry weapons for protection against wild animals, care being taken to attach such conditions to the permission as will prevent those weapons being used against the Government itself.

Remarks and suggestions in connection with the clearance of canals in Sind.

25. The Sind Sudhár (155), in its issue of the 18th April, says:—This year the clearance of all the large canals in táluka Tando Bago of the Hyderabad District was commenced so vigorously that the Zamindárs were elated at the idea of being able to extend the sphere of their cultivation by bringing under the plough all the waste land adjoining their holdings, but they were soon disappointed. The work so well begun at the mouths of the canals was continued only for a few days and was then stopped. It was again commenced at the other end of the canals, where also it was carried on satisfactorily. But the middle portions of the canals have not been cleared. We hear that this bad state of things continues even till now. Seeing that the time for opening the canals is near, the Zamindárs are in a painful situation. They say that as the mouths of the canals will be silted up the water will not rise and consequently there will be no cultivation. For this reason they are sorely disappointed to see that not only their great expectations have not been fulfilled, but that they are also in danger of losing their usual food. Not knowing whether this state of things has reached the ears of the present Superintending Engineer in Sind, an intelligent, experienced and patient officer, we beg to invite his attention to this matter and hope that, although the time is short, he will make some suitable arrangement to avert the danger.

The distressed condition of the people of Varankhora in the Sátára District.

26. The Pratod (56), in its issue of the 4th May, says:—It is to be much regretted that no Government officer has paid attention to the continuous entreaties for the last twenty years of the poor inhabitants of Varankhora, a wild tract of land in the Válva Táluka of the Sátára District, for granting them lands which were once brought by them under cultivation without the permission of Government, but which have been taken away from them and included in the reserved forests. No high officials have ever visited this glen, and consequently they are ignorant of the wretched condition of the petitioners. We hope our kind Collector, Mr. Candy, will personally ascertain their real condition and save them from starvation.

27. The Arunodayá (20), in its issue of the 3rd May, says:—It appears from a correspondent's letter that the interests of the rayats of the village of Lonad in the Bhiwndi Táluka have not been properly looked after. The village is held in Inám by the Joshi (village astrologer) of Kalyán. The people have been in sore want of a good supply of water, but nothing has been done in the matter by the Local Board. The rayats have been strictly prohibited by the Inámdár from bringing from the village forest even small branches of trees for fuel. Of late the vice of drinking has considerably grown among the villagers, as is seen from an increase in the sale of liquor during the last eight months. These grievances of the people ought to be removed.

Grievances of the people of Lonad in the Bhiwndi Táluka of the Thána District.

28. The Dnyánodayá (11), in its issue of the 7th May, writes:—The Indian Messenger is much exercised over the decay of Bengali vernacular literature. It deplores the fact that the former generation of writers, who comprised men who were an adornment to Bengali literature, has left no worthy successor. The writers of the present day think only of making money by writing books that pander to the lowest tastes. Indecent literature is largely on the increase, and to it is largely due the growing laxity in the morals of Bengali youth. We fear that the condition of vernacular literature is not much better in this presidency. Presses are busy enough, but their productions have but little to commend in them. Occasionally a really good book is issued, showing what might be done if the matter were seriously taken to heart. We have noticed recently a tendency to imitate the trashy English novel, reproducing its worst features. This promises badly for the future. We cannot but think that Government might do more to check the growth of bad literature. Every publication passes under the eye of the Registrar of Native Publications, and every book containing serious moral defect might easily be prohibited from further circulation.

Alleged increase of bad vernacular literature in the Bombay Presidency.

29. The Bombay correspondent of the Kesari (42), in its issue of the 5th May, says that the clerks employed on the work of classifying the information given in the census schedules for the city of Bombay, have not yet been paid for the services they rendered in the month of March last, and that the inconvenience which the poor clerks are thereby put to is indescribable, and expresses a hope that they will be soon paid.

A complaint about the delay in the payment of their wages to clerks employed on census duty in Bombay.

30. A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 8th May, says:—A strange rumour prevails at Tárápur in the Thána District that last week the place was visited by a Russian spy, who was as tall as a grenadier and he made a sketch of the old Portuguese fort at that town. The spy is said to be conversant with about six languages and did his work very secretly. He is said to have proceeded to Bassein.

Rumour about a Russian spy having visited Tárápur in the Thána District.

31. In connection with the Rájábái Tower tragedy at Bombay, the O Portuguez Britannico (157), in its issue of the 2nd May, says:—The theory of suicide is one that the Pársis appear determined not to acknowledge, but it seems to us to be the one which every circumstance that has been brought to light more than plausibly points to. In the first place, there is the fact that the girls left the house on the pretence of going to visit an aunt and that they proceeded to the clock tower instead. Then they had declared they had seen the clock-works before, and yet they gave the havildár two annas and asked him to take them round and show them the works; and when the key was brought and the havildár asked them to go with him, they said they would go afterwards. They wanted half an hour to themselves, and it was in this half-hour that the tragedy was enacted. Then there is the circumstance of Bachubái, the elder of the two girls, a full-bodied healthy person of 20 years of age, living in the house of her husband without having any marital relations with the man. Indeed, the two treated one another with less familiarity than even brother and sister would, which may be gathered from the fact that on the day of her death, before leaving the house, she paid back a rupee she had borrowed from her husband. Of course, as yet we are not warranted in concluding that the case was one of suicide; but, as we have said, the circumstances point to its being suicide of one of the two girls and accident in the case of the other while trying to save her sister-in-law. The evidence of Dr. Sydney Smith at the Coroner's inquest may possibly clear the matter.

The theory of accident upheld in the case of the Rájábái Tower fatality.

32. The Din Bandhu (9), in its issue of the 3rd May, writing on the same subject, observes that there are no grounds whatever to support the belief, which a large majority of the Pársis entertain, that an outrage was committed on the deceased, while the circumstances hitherto come to light uphold the theory of accident. Owing to the stirring agitation made by the Pársis in this case the police have zealously continued the enquiry, though they are sure that nothing important will come out of it.

Observations in connection with the Rájábái Tower tragedy.

33. Referring to the same subject, the Rást Goftár (86), in its issue of the 3rd May, writes:—There is a complete absence of motive for a suicide. Even if any persons were to go up the heights with the predetermination to kill themselves, their awful situation might, at the supreme moment, give them pause. But there was nothing in the modest happiness of their homes, there was nothing in their look, or manner, or speech on that fatal day, to lead one to suppose that the two poor ladies had been so tired of life as to go all the way to the tower with a desperate resolve to throw themselves down, and to have the courage to carry out their resolve. Nay, evidence is forthcoming that they had left home with the object of attending a lecture, that having found themselves too early for the lecture they made up their minds to see the tower, that on their way they asked a lady friend to accompany them, and that on her pleading some excuse they went alone. Their minds were as sound as their body. Those who had seen them in the Tower had noticed nothing unusual in them. The theory of suicide is most absurd. There is not a tittle of evidence or argument to support it. Was it accident? Might it be that one of the ladies had accidentally fallen from a window or a parapet wall, and that the other, in a frantic attempt to save her sister, might have been overbalanced? The window sill is high enough, and so is the parapet wall, which precludes the possibility of an accident. Was it then foul play? While the mangled remains of the two poor girls were lying under the porch they were examined by two medical men, and they are unanimous and emphatic in their opinion that an outrage had been committed. They saw numerous nail-marks on the body, about the head, breast and thighs. They found the trousers of one of the girls torn and the tape tying them at the waste broken. The marks were such that they could not have been caused by the fall. The police suggests that they may have been caused by the silver-buttons which one of them wore, and by their glass bangles which were broken to pieces. The number, the form and the position of the marks are rather indicative of a terrible scuffle—a scuffle for life and death, a scuffle for all that a good woman holds dearer than life. It is just a possibility that they may not be the result of a struggle. But they cannot possibly have been caused by buttons and bangles. The suggestion seems to have been put forward, as if with the object of explaining away a dark mystery anyhow. The Surgeon to the Coroner will be able to say whether any outrage had been committed or not. But even if his examination were to show that no outrage had been committed, it would not at all be sufficient evidence for dismissing the theory that no attempt whatever had been made upon their honour. It is possible that the monsters attacking them, when foiled in their design, and in the madness of fear and passion, may have hurled one or both down and made their escape. But then there were five other men in the tower about that time forming a miscellaneous group. If there was a desperate struggle going on in any part of the tower, it is very strange, though not impossible, that these men heard no noise. It is also strange, though not impossible, that the villains could have found time to run away before the police came up and searched the tower. In the heat of excitement people make various surmises, but it is not for us to give currency to them. If this horrible deed is done by villains, it is for the reputation of the police and of the Superintendent who conducts this enquiry with zeal and energy, to discover them and bring them to their doom. We have seen that the theory of suicide is an absurdity; we have seen that accident was next to impossible. The only conjecture that is then open to us is foul play. Every Pársi confidently expects that our esteemed townsman, Doctor Blaney, will come to the investigation of this tragedy with an open mind, and that he will make the most careful enquiry with such excellent legal assistance as has been provided by the relatives of the dead. What the public want is a solution of the mystery, whatever it may be. What they want is that the darkness may be dispelled which hangs over this grievous heart-rending fatality. If the mystery be never solved,—if the police, after honest endeavours, fail in their efforts to solve it,—let them say that they have conscientiously tried and failed. The Pársis believe, in the absence of any other reasonable or probable theory, that an unspeakable crime has been committed in the heart of the city, in broad daylight, under the very shadow of justice and of Government. If the police put forth all their exertions and fail, they will have done their duty, and all honour to them for doing their duty. The tragedy will then have been thoroughly complete in all the circumstances of horror which surround and enshroud it. Reports and rumours in connection with the Rájábái Tower tragedy.

34. The Káthiáwár Times (3), which in its issue of the 4th May supports the theory of the Rájábái Tower fatality being the result of an outrage committed on the two Pársi ladies, in its issue of the 5th idem says:—As yet the police have not succeeded in obtaining a clue to the murderers of the two Pársi ladies, though their exertions in this direction have not relaxed. They seem to be working with more zeal; and we are glad to hear that His Excellency Lord Harris has very kindly signified his desire to the Police Commissioner to do his best to trace the offenders and to clear up the mystery. This step on the part of our kind Governor entitles him to the respect and love of the people. The latest rumour in Bombay is that the perpetrators, be they Khojas or Mahomedans, are rich and have been expending large sums of money to have the matter hushed up. The police are reluctant to supply any information to the public, as the information appearing in public prints frustrates their enquiries.

Some reports in connection with the Rájábái Tower tragedy that are said to support the theory of the deceased being victims of violence, and a request to the police.

35. In alluding to the enquiry going on before the Coroner of Bombay into the circumstances of the same tragical deaths the Jáme Jamshed (84), in its issue of the 9th May, says:—From the evidence of the Hindu boy Haridás Jivráj and a Hindu milkman recorded before the Coroner's jury on Thursday last, the police is said to draw the conclusion that one of the two Pársi ladies actually committed suicide, while one of the local English newspapers draws the inference that the catastrophe may be attributed to accident. But it seems to us that this evidence goes to support the theory of the deceased being victims of violence practised on them, entertained by the entire Pársi community. Additional support has been received by the last-mentioned supposition from the report that two Pársi children, who were on the tower waiting to hear the chiming of the clock bells at 3½ P.M., state that two Pársi ladies, who appeared much terrified and whose clothes were torn, came up the tower running and could not utter one word; that they went to a corner and began weeping hard, that in the meanwhile certain persons came up running, and that these two children expect to recognize one of these persons from howsoever large a crowd. It is to be hoped that these two children will be produced before the authorities. Four days ago we heard another rumour that at the time of the tower tragedy a gentleman, who came from Colába, was passing in a carriage along the stone parapet wall that runs from the Bandstand to the Church Gate railway station, and he noticed a lady fall from the tower. He further observed that another lady was standing outside the balcony with both her hands leaning against the balcony walls. It is also said that this gentleman saw somebody standing in the balcony push away the hands of the lady from the walls, but could not recognize who it was that committed this of her death, before leaving the house, she paid back a rupee she had borrowed from her husband. Of course, as yet we are not warranted in concluding that the case was one of suicide; but, as we have said, the circumstances point to its being suicide of one of the two girls and accident in the case of the other while trying to save her sister-in-law. It is to be hoped that an enquiry will be made by the police about this gentleman, who should not fail to come forward in the interests of outraged humanity.

Subscription fund opened among the Pársis for offering rewards for the apprehension of the perpetrators of alleged outrage on two Pársi ladies in the Rájábái Tower.

36. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 4th May, starts a subscription fund among the Pársis for the purpose of offering, with the consent of the Commissioner of Police, Bombay, rewards for the apprehension of the perpetrators of the outrage alleged to have been committed, or attempted to be committed, on the two Pársi ladies Bachubái and Perozbái whose corpses were found at the foot of the Rájábái Tower on the afternoon of 25th April last.

Alleged commission of the crime of rape on a girl six years old at Mahudha in the Kaira District.

37. The Svadesh Bandhu (126), in its issue of the 6th May, states that a Khedával Brahmin is said to have committed rape at Mahudha on a Koli girl aged about six years, and was severely beaten by the people for committing the crime. The offender has since disappeared, but the police ought to trace him out and get him punished by law.

Frequency of thefts at Násik and the local police.

38. A correspondent, writing from Násik to the Native Opinion (15) in its issue of the 7th May, says that the nose-ring of the wife of Ráo Sáheb Pendse, Daftardár to the Commissioner, S. D., was snatched away from her person by an audacious thief between the hours of 6 and 7 P.M. on Sunday the 3rd instant, while the lady was walking through a street a few yards from her house at Násik, and observes that neither this crime, nor the theft committed in the house of a Kulkarni last week, nor the burglary perpetrated recently at the house of a coppersmith in the same town has been yet detected, thereby bringing the Násik police into disrepute.

Cancellation of the order of rustication passed against some students of the Deccan College, Poona.

39. The Dnyán Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 7th May, is glad to state that the students of the Deccan College, Poona, who were rusticated for a year, having submitted a petition to the Principal of the College protesting against the charge of misbehaviour brought against them, the Principal has, on a re-consideration of the matter, cancelled the order of their rustication.

PART III.—Municipalities.

Government resolution on the administration report of the Bombay Municipality for 1889-90 criticised.

40. The Jáme Jamshed (84), in its issue of the 5th May, says:—The Government resolution on the administration report of the Bombay Municipality for 1889-90 is not satisfactory. It is to be regretted that no notice should have been taken of the heavy burden of taxation borne by the rate-payers, whose grievance ought to have been pressed upon the attention of the Corporation by Government, nor has the Corporation's attention been drawn to the heavy municipal expenditure. The advice given by Government for framing estimates considerably in excess of the probable requirements of the Engineer's Department is of such a kind as Government would not like to be adopted by its own Engineering Department.

The Bombay Government and the Poona Municipality.

41. The Mahratta (4), in its issue of the 3rd May, writes:—We are extremely glad to notice that the differences between the Poona Municipality and Government are gradually being squared, and there are hopeful signs that, probably before the close of the approaching Poona season, a complete good understanding will be restored. The credit of the reconciliation will, in no small measure, be due to the new Collector, Mr. Reid, and our popular Commissioner, the Honourable Mr. Moore. Originally there was not much difference between the officers of Government and our city fathers. But the conduct of Mr. East created an official party in the municipality, and it was the aggressive and unjustifiable conduct of this official party that gave offence. The strained relations culminated in the illegal private enquiry held by Mr. Plunkett. On the side of the non-official party the last straw that broke the camel's back was the protest which the municipality made against the offensive tone of Mr. East's communications. Matters came to a head and the now notorious resolution of Government, dated 6th January, served as an ultimatum given to the municipality. The municipality very justly refused to surrender. At this very juncture the officials changed, wiser counsels prevailed in the Secretariat, and gradually there was a change for the better, and the resolution of Government, No. 1105, dated 24th March 1891, declares the truce. Under these circumstances and in the interests of the very important reform of self-government, we have simple advice to give to our city fathers, that they should not protest too much. Let them not fly at a tangent. Let them try to meet. With these few preliminary observations we proceed to review the resolution of 24th March. In the first paragraph of the resolution Government says that the municipality did not seize the opportunity offered to them by the Collector of explaining the circumstances which were regarded as irregular by their colleague, Mr. Joglekar. In the sentence which follows Government says, "Such an explanation would have been a more satisfactory way of meeting the charges than a mere dismissal of them as groundless." We fear Government is not properly informed, otherwise it would not have given this left-handed compliment to the corporation. The charges of Mr. Joglekar were not merely dismissed as groundless; they were considered, discussed and dismissed as charges not borne out by facts. But supposing that they were dismissed as groundless, has Government reason to challenge the decision of the body as a municipality? Government ought to recollect that it is their own doing. Under the old Act the Collector had the power of suspending the operation of a resolution passed by a majority if he thought that the majority was in the wrong and the minority in the right. The new Act deprived the Collector of this power with the express object of giving the popular boards sufficient independence, so that if the municipality decides by a solid majority that the charges are groundless, Government ought not to question the soundness of such a decision. The Collector could well have exercised the powers given him by the Act and requested the municipality to consider the complaints of Mr. Joglekar and to submit to him a report. But he does nothing like it. He takes Mr. Joglekar's complaints and threatens the municipality that he will move Government to make an enquiry into the municipal administration. Wishing to avoid unpleasant friction, the municipality send their explanation. On receipt of this the Collector at once proceeds to ask Mr. Plunkett to hold an enquiry, and the City Magistrate issues summonses to witnesses, takes their depositions, makes his report to the Collector, who in his turn makes his report to Government, and Government issue their resolution. Where was then the opportunity said to be given to explain? This whole procedure is high-handed, one-sided and illegal. In the enquiry itself the municipality is unrepresented. No opportunity of cross-examining the witnesses is given to the municipality. Irresponsible witnesses come, state what they choose, and Government bases its resolution on the results of the enquiry Government, however, is now pleased to give copies of the papers connected with the enquiry, and thus afford the municipality opportunity to say what they have to say in their defence. The mischief done has thus been partially repaired, and it is therefore no good to cry over spilt milk, as they say. Then in the second paragraph of the resolution Government say that the Collector was refused an explanation. This statement, we are constrained to say, is wide of the truth. The Commissioner and Government may approve of the steps the Collector took. That is not the question. The question is whether the steps that were taken by the Collector are within the law. If they are not, the mere approval of them by Government cannot be sufficient to exonerate the authorities concerned from the blame. The municipality has been severely found fault with, and we fear Government gave room to the public to suspect that local self-government was in danger. People believed that if the affairs of the city administration in Poona could not be well managed there was little chance of securing satisfactory results in the mofussil, and it was the sense of their concern that induced them to raise the dismal cry of self-government in danger. The party of the apologists of narrow-minded officials enjoyed the triumph, but the responsible representatives of the people smarted under a feeling of shame, and Lord Harris' Government has shown laudable sense of duty in allaying popular fears by issuing the resolution under review. Government expresses its gratification at finding that the opinions of the municipality and Government are no longer in conflict as to the necessity of amending the Municipal Act. We are also gratified at this consensus, because the changes which the municipality of Poona demands are not radical. In their letter dated 20th February, the municipality have recommended that the constitution clauses of the Act ought to be amended so as to allow the municipality powers to make arrangements for the speedy execution of orders and prompt despatch of business. This is all that is wanted. Mr. Grant, the Commissioner of the Central Division, testifies to the earnest desire of the Poona Municipality to act for the best, and Government was certainly very prudently advised when, forgetting all that had happened, it decided to look to the Poona Municipality for aid in the formulation of the scheme. The records in the Legislative Department of Government will show that the Legislature is greatly indebted to the Poona Municipality for some of the excellent features of the Municipal Act Amendment Act, and we have no doubt that on this occasion, too, the municipality would show in their scheme that they well deserve the confidence reposed in them. Coming to the scheme itself, we are most reluctantly compelled to go into the enquiry papers a little. We do so, because from the resolution before us Government appears to be still labouring under a misconception. It wishes the municipality to submit the explanation and the scheme together, evidently expressing thereby its expectation to find in the scheme provisions against the alleged irregularities. We beg leave here to state for the information of Government that the allegation about the existence of irregularities is false and unfounded. A searching examination of the enquiry papers will show to any unprejudiced person of ordinary common sense that the reports of Mr. East are founded upon sand. The whole affair from top to bottom is the creation of misguided energy, misleading ambition, and foolish desire of triumph in a party squabble. Mr. Plunkett and Mr. East are both the unknowing victims of a clique of municipal malcontents,—persons who for one or other circumstance suppose they have a grievance. We have carefully read Ráo Bahádur Joglekar's first letter, and we find that there is nothing in it which the Ráo Bahádur can be ashamed to own as his. But the papers in the enquiry show that the sting in the whole affair has come from some unknown quarter. Some Iago appears to have worked upon the easy minds of Messrs. East and Plunkett and raised their suspicions. His devilish work was so far successful that both these officers lost their balance of mind and became blind and incapable of sifting truth. They have shown such a bias against the municipality that those who do not know their good natures would at once stigmatise the reports as productions of the traducers of the municipality themselves. While the enquiry went on, several very ugly rumours floated in the atmosphere of the streets in Budhwár and Shukrawár. They were so ugly that we refused to take any notice of them. But we now repent, for, if we had taken note of them, we should have been in a position to-day to set Messrs. East and Plunkett right in the eyes of the public by showing to demonstration that they at least were innocent. We could have also traced the whole affair to the doors of somebody. But it is now no good going into this unfortunate affair. We would cut it short by stating that Government would be surprised to find that the mature scheme suggests remedies in unexpected directions. The published literature on the subject shows that there has been no infringement of rules, no unauthorized transfers from one budget head to another, no unauthorized or lavish acquisition of land, no waste of public money. It shows that there has been a marked tendency to throw upon the general body work which ought to properly belong to the managing committee; that the duties and responsibilities which must devolve upon the paid executive have gradually shifted to the shoulders of the honorary executive; that an important omission in the Act has rendered effective supervision of sanitary work impossible; that much routine work is delayed and oftentimes blocked in its very passage to the proper authorities. Under the present Act the stipendiary establishment is free of all responsibility, whereas honorary members are taken to task for their mistakes and for their ignorance. We think under present arrangements the municipality is too much exposed and stands in the unenviable position of a Native Prince trembling and quaking in the hands of the political officer. Unless it is well protected with the shield of a responsible executive officer the good system of self-government would suffer. The executive officer, we submit, should be responsible for all executive work, but he should not be independent of the municipality as the Bombay Municipal Commissioner is. If in their inordinate desire to please the offended deities of Government our city fathers should surrender their power and control over their executive, they may gain the favour of Government, but they will ruin the interests of their city. In Bombay things are worse than anywhere else. The heads of departments are following the policy of "Don't care" and the rate-payers' money is being wasted, municipal revenue is unprotected, and borrowing has dulled the edge of husbandry. Let us hope that our city fathers will set an example to Bombay by seeing that the change is not from complete emancipation to complete thraldom.

Affairs at Manipur.

42. In an article, headed, "The Affairs at Manipur," the Indu Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 4th May, says:—Whatever excesses the Manipuris did, it was never doubted that they would be crushed like worms. The expectation has been fully realized, and it is not necessary to accentuate it by further acts of aggression. Justice, indeed, has to be vindicated. The men who are responsible for the acts of cruelty of the 24th March should be properly punished. But this punishment should be confined to individuals, and not extended to the whole State. The British Government has already proclaimed an amnesty to the people, declaring that their quarrel was not with them but with the princes who had offended the British, and therefore calling upon the people to resume their peaceful occupations. To such a proclamation, the maintenance of the Ráj as a feudatory State rather than annexation would be a just sequence. Thus, on all grounds of policy, humanity and self-interest, annexation seems to be undesirable and the reconstitution of some Native government appears the best solution. The ease and rapidity with which the occupation of Manipur has been accomplished suggests the reflection that there has been all round a gross miscalculation in the affair. On the occasion of Mr. Quinton's expedition the enemy's strength was grossly under-estimated. In the present case it has been over-estimated. The catastrophe which overtook Mr. Quinton and his party was, in a manner, invited by themselves. Mr. Quinton may have acted strictly within his instructions, but there is no doubt there was serious bungling somewhere. Whether the Foreign Office issued wrong instructions, or whether the British officers on the spot blundered, the fact seems to be incontrovertible that it was the British who from the first had offensive designs, who took the offensive unprovoked, and made the attack, although fully conscious of their own weakness and the odds against them. The Manipuris in self-defence retaliated, and when they found they had the advantage of their opponents took the offensive on their own account. We do not sympathise with the Manipuris, nor do we justify their action. In any event, the massacre they committed on the 24th March is highly unjustifiable. But what we are concerned to point out is that the British officers showed a lamentable want of discretion and judgment in making the attack they did in their state of unpreparedness. In the later expedition there is an entire want of proportion between the preparation and the object to be gained. A regular campaign has been organized on an extensive scale with three columns marching from three different directions and converging simultaneously on Manipur. Praises will be showered, as indeed they have already begun to be showered, upon the military officers concerned for the excellent precision with which they have carried out their strategic movements. But one is tempted to ask, where was the need for all this strategy? The Manipuris are a pack of savages destined to run away at the sound of British guns like packs of deer. Captain Grant's success fully showed what they were capable of. With the exception of Captain Drury's engagemen it has been a mere walk-over for the whole expedition. We emphasise this point on two grounds: first, the question of cost, and, secondly, the praises and compliments that will be thrown away broadcast. What an amount of money these expeditions cost! If Mr. Quinton's expedition had been properly equipped, what an expenditure of life and money would have been saved! Further, if a punitive expedition was necessary, one proportionate to the needs ought to have been sent. There is a total disregard of cost in all these proceedings. As to compliments, it has become quite a fashion to bestow praises pell-mell on military officers for taking part in any trumpery expedition. Acts of duty are held up as great acts of gallantry, and the Government has been accustomed to give, and the military officers accustomed to expect, rewards for the slightest service. An indiscriminate distribution of honours is highly demoralizing. In the present case, therefore, we should deprecate any exultation or excessive rejoicing at the success gained. Success was certain. It would have been a disgrace if it had been otherwise. There is therefore no occasion for any jubilation or panegyrics for our military officers having done what was a sheer necessity. [The Gujarát Mitrá (82), the Kaiser-i-Hind (85) and the Hindusthán (105) of the 3rd May make remarks to the same purport as the above.]

Approval of the remarks recently made by Lord Ripon in the House of Lords in connection with Manipur.

43. In alluding to the discussion which took place last week in the House of Lords regarding the Manipur catastrophe, the Gujarátí (81), in its issue of the 3rd May, writes:—Lord Ripon justly deplored the death of Mr. Quinton, one of the valued and experienced officers of Government, who recently fell a victim to the feelings of resentment and anger on the part of the Manipuris, but, at the same time, expressed a hope that the Government would be guided in their action in Manipur by a policy of respect for the native races, which had, he said, secured prolonged peace in India. Already high-toned critics have endeavoured to remind the Marquis of those wretched and disastrous principles of what is euphemistically termed practical politics, which a certain class of interested scribes always puts forward in support of Government measures, however fraught with dangerous consequences, in supreme and defiant contempt of that inner voice of conscience which naturally prompted that great Viceroy to sound a warning note in time. It would be useless now to enquire as to who is to be primarily held responsible for the catastrophe. An impartial historian will have to say a good deal on that point. The question now is, what is to be done with Manipur? The British troops have already occupied the territory, not without some bloodshed. Jubráj, the Senápati and the Regent have fled away, and some sort of order will soon have to be established. We entirely share in the feeling of Lord Ripon that, in a moment of excitement and indignation and in the keenness of a desire for revenge for which more than one influential journal was clamouring at the top of its voice, far-reaching considerations will not be ignored in presence of the impulses of low and selfish instincts.

His Excellency Lord Harris and the good His Lordship has done to the Native Chiefs and Princes of Káthiáwár.

44. The Gujarát Mitrá (82), in its issue of the 3rd May, writes:—The Government of Lord Harris is fast swelling the list of its useful and important works. A recent resolution warns all Agency officials against the acceptance of any hospitality from Native Chiefs and Princes when on circuit, as also not to occupy the utárás or travellers' bungalows. The Princes, who are often obliged to spend enormous sums on the hospitable reception of British servants, from the august Resident to the petty clerk, will be the best judges of the good thus conferred upon them by Lord Harris. [The Hitechchhu (83) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 9th May, expresses similar sentiments, requests Government to issue similar instructions to District Collectors and other Government officials, and observes that since a great many of the retired political officers are believed to have amassed large fortunes by illegal means, it would be well to make a careful enquiry into their financial positions.]

Administration of the Gwalior State under the Council of Regency.

45. The Káthiáwár Times (3), in its issue of the 1st May, writes:—It is stated, seemingly on reliable authority, that the State of Gwalior has been so peculiarly administered by the British Government in the name of the so-called Council of Regency that its falling income is barely found sufficient to cover the expenditure. The greater portion of the treasure saved by the late Chief has, we are told, already passed over to the British Government. A correspondent writing to India says: "Now the Government of India seems to entertain a desire to deprive the State of its yet remaining treasure, and has suggested that the money (if there be any) should be invested in some undertaking of great utility. The Government of India has also expressed a wish that all the 'hoarded silver' in the Gwalior vaults should come into the hands of the Mint Master at Calcutta." If Native States under British management have not always thriven, it is probably because of the employment of a most expensive, not to say lavish, machinery, whose services the State perhaps does not require at all. The same thing has seemingly happened in Gwalior.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = ə in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ā.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Observations on the rumoured retirement of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne.

1. The Subodh Patrika (16), in its issue of the 10th May, writes:—For some time past it was widely rumoured, both here and in England, that His Excellency Lord Lansdowne intended to retire at an early date on the ground of ill-health, and speculation was rife as to his probable successor. The report is, however, now contradicted. We hope the contradiction is correct and the rumour false. His Lordship has proved himself to be a wise and firm ruler so far, and the public naturally desire that his rule should not come to a close before its proper period.

2. The Pársi Tíkákár (114), in its issue of the 15th May, in its usual humorous style, observes:—Some of the important measures of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's rule, such as the conquest of Manipur, the Black Mountain expedition, the Age of Consent Act, the conciliatory policy leading to friendly feelings on the part of the Amir of Afghanistan towards India and the restoration of complete tranquillity in Upper Burmah have made His Lordship so popular that his untimely departure from India is sure to cause widespread regret among the Indian subjects.

Remarks on the resolution passed by the House of Commons abolishing the opium trade in India.

3. In alluding to the debate in the House of Commons on the motion of Sir Joseph Pease for the abolition of the Indian opium trade, the Rást Goftár (86), in its issue of the 10th May, writes:—There does not seem to be any special moral objection to the opium traffic which will not apply with equal, if not greater, force to the traffic in spirits. If Sir Joseph Pease wishes to be consistent in his political morality, he ought to follow up his opium resolution with another for the suppression of all traffic in alcoholic drinks in Great Britain, and, for the matter of that, throughout the whole of the British Empire. But it is said that opium in small doses is not only not injurious, but is a healthy tonic. You cannot argue against the use of an article because its abuse by a certain proportion of the people consuming it is injurious. The worthy Baronet has snatched a victory in the House of Commons; but it is a moral victory, having only an academical interest attached to it. The resolution passed by the House is not a mandate to the Government of India to prohibit the cultivation of the poppy. The prohibition would cost this country a sum of five millions sterling per year, which it cannot recover from other sources of taxation. India is taxed heavily enough in all conscience. Is it true that the British Government is forcing opium on the Chinese? This is hard to believe in presence of the fact that the Chinese Government can levy whatever duty they like on Indian opium, and that they have also a right to stop its importation altogether, after giving twelve months' notice. If the Chinese do not want Indian opium, it would be the easiest thing in the world for their Government to prohibit its importation. But as they continue to allow its importation, the obvious inference is that they want it. Indian opium is far superior to the drug produced in China itself, and therefore it is much prized. Even if opium were nothing better than a poison, and if people would have it nevertheless, it would be better that they should have that which is less injurious. The adoption of Sir Joseph Pease's motion is a cheap victory. If he ever submits in future a proposal for the reimbursement of the loss that would be caused by the stoppage of the opium traffic to the Indian revenue the question will assume a practical interest, and then his victory will, in all likelihood, turn into a defeat.

Disapproval of the pension granted to Mr. A. T. Crawford.

4. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 14th May, writes:—Anticipations have not proved false, and, as expected, the India Office has granted Mr. Crawford an allowance of £150 for his past services. This sum, added to the respective allowances to his wife and daughter, nearly makes up the sum total of what Mr. Crawford might have claimed, if he had been allowed to retire on pension without prosecution. Some of Mr. Crawford's services have, indeed, been very commendable, but we have yet to know the principles of morality and justice on which a dismissed individual might be allowed pension or quasi-pension. The sum may appear very small, but that is an evident indication of a fall in the moral status of the India Office. To approve of the actions of a Government and, in the same breath, to neutralize their moral effect upon its administration, is really a glaring deterioration of its moral nerve. Lord Cross ought to have known that the question was not of pounds and shillings, but of Government's moral prestige and of the maintenance of a high moral tone in the Indian services. That tone the Government of Lord Reay honestly endeavoured to keep up, but it has now been torn asunder by the present freak of the India Office. If good work could thus be demolished and a Government's action so easily discredited, what wonder would there be if people lost all confidence in that Government? Whatever the nature of the allowance, it will not prove the less mischievous in the end. Mr. Crawford may be congratulated on his unprecedented success, but few will excuse the India Council for their glaring perversity. We are sorry Lord Cross could not see that his benevolence in the matter, of course at the cost of India, was over-reaching his otherwise better judgment.

Maintenance allowance granted to Mr. Arthur Crawford by the India Council approved.

5. The Bombay Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 14th May, says that the allowance of one hundred and fifty pounds per annum granted to Mr. Arthur Crawford by the India Council is, considering Mr. Crawford's position in life and the pensions drawn by officers of his standing, a pittance to which no native of India will object.

Confirmation of Mr. Justice Farran in place of Mr. Justice Scott on the Bombay High Court bench desired.

6. In alluding to the rumour that the seat on the Bombay High Court bench vacated by Mr. Justice Scott is to be filled up by a barrister from England, the Jáme Jamshed (84), in its issue of the 12th May, says:—India has had good experience of the practice of the English Ministry to sacrifice Indian interests for the benefit of their friends, as proved by several appointments to the different Indian High Courts. It may not be improbable, therefore, that a serious thought should have been entertained to fill up the vacancy created by the retirement of Mr. Justice Scott by an appointment from England of one who has rendered party services to the Ministry. But Mr. Justice Farran, who has several times filled up acting appointments at a sacrifice of personal interests, rendering much satisfaction to the public and the profession, ought not to be superseded. He is an able barrister and a calm, straightforward, clear-headed and impartial Judge, and his supersession is sure to call forth a strong protest from the public. [The Akhbáre Sodágar (91), in its issue of the same date, expresses similar sentiments.]

Mr. Maclean, M. P., on the Age of Consent law and the frontier troubles.

7. The Ahmedabad Times (89), in its issue of the 13th May, observes:—Mr. Maclean, the Right Honourable Member for Oldham, generally goes wrong by opposing the interests of the natives of India, but his recently expressed opinion that the Age of Consent Act has given rise to troubles on the frontier is quite correct and deserves due respect and consideration from the Indian Government.

8. The Rást Goftár (86) and the Gujarát Mitra (82), in their issues of the 10th May, and several other vernacular newspapers of this and previous weeks disapprove of the views of Mr. Maclean, considering them quite erroneous, and wonder how could a veteran Indian journalist make such an egregious mistake, except that he is out of touch with the present situation in India, and this makes him go wrong when discussing Indian matters.

Opinion on the work of the Fourth Provincial Conference recently held at Poona.

9. The Bombay Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 13th May, says:—The Fourth Provincial Conference recently held at Poona has, like its predecessors, been distinguished by two features, namely, want of enthusiasm and of solidity. Though the Conference has been working for the last four years, no solid or appreciable results have followed from its labours. The blame of this unsatisfactory result may, to a large extent, be debited to the account of Government, but the leaders of the Conference also deserve a good deal of it. These leaders have not yet succeeded in creating sufficient enthusiasm for the Conference among the people of this presidency. The latest evidence in support of this charge is that out of about ninety delegates at the fourth Conference, sixty were from the Poona city and the rest were in lots of twos or threes from each of the several places in the Deccan. Thus this year's Conference was composed of the Deccanis alone and the proceedings were held in Maráthi. The assembly could not be considered to be a representative meeting of the whole presidency, and as such it commands less influence than its predecessors possessed. Even the small enthusiasm that was perceptible at previous meetings was to a certain extent wanting at the last Conference, the same being damped by the split that has been caused by the Age of Consent Act among the Hindu communities. There is, however, not the least doubt that the several resolutions passed at the meeting were right and appropriate, and have the support of every Native of this presidency. It is to be hoped that the leading citizens of Poona will be able to create sufficient enthusiasm for the cause of the Conference so as to make future Conferences represent the whole of the presidency. [The Jáme Jamshed (84), in its issues of the 13th and 14th May, expresses similar sentiments.]

Remarks in connection with the subjects to be discussed at the next meeting of the Provincial Conference at Poona.

10. The Poona Vaibhav (53), in its issue of the 10th May, says :—It is to be regretted that in the list of the subjects to be discussed at the coming meeting of the Provincial Conference proposals for submitting a protest to the Home Government against the Age of Consent Act and for adopting a resolution not to use any other than indigenous textile goods are not to be found. Experience has shown that there is no use in preferring prayers to Government for any concessions. How strange is it to expect Government to repeal the Forest, Salt, Income-tax and Cattle-pound Acts when we mutely submit to the inconveniences caused by these laws! We must prove our fitness for new concessions by doing such acts as will induce Englishmen to make concessions without our asking for them; for instance, not to use other goods than indigenous textile products.

Advantages of a resolution to use no other textile goods than indigenous manufactures.

11. In another leader the same newspaper observes :—Several advantages will be derived by the use of indigenous clothes. Firstly, the large amount of money that goes out of the country by the use of foreign cloth will remain in India, enabling numerous artisans and other classes, who are now starving, to obtain the means of honest living. Secondly, India being the largest customer of English textile products, people in England will know that the natives of India have been driven by harsh laws to resolve to discontinue the use of English cloth and will support the grievances of the people of India before Parliament, as their pecuniary interests will suffer from a discontinuance of the use of English cloth in India. The cotton manufacturers of England possess vast influence with Parliament, which immediately attends to the removal of their grievances. Thirdly, the resolution to use no other than indigenous textile goods will convince foreigners that some spirit is still left in the natives of India. Notwithstanding the prospect of such great advantages accruing from a resolution to use native textile goods alone, social reformers foolishly scout at so good an idea and run it down most vehemently.

Alleged corruption of low-paid Government servants in Sind and a recommendation to raise their salaries.

12. The Sind Sudhár (155), in its issue of the 2nd May, says :—The salaries of some of the appointments under Government are so very low that the incumbents are obliged to find some other source of income. This accounts for the corrupt practices on the part of subordinate Government officials. Tapádárs, Darogás, Sub-overseers, Police Munshis and Sepoys are instances in point. The salaries which these officers receive are insignificant compared to the important duties which they are required to perform. The fixed pay which a Tapádár receives from Government is hardly sufficient to cover his household expenditure. He is therefore obliged to oppress the subjects and to obtain illegal gratification. The people have thus reason to be dissatisfied with Government. If, therefore, Government wish that the people should be happy and prosperous, let them endeavour to put a stop to the practice of receiving bribes on the part of their officials. This can be best accomplished by raising the salaries of those officers who in consequence of their low pay are now compelled to stoop to corruption.

Hardships alleged to be suffered by poor people occupying the mountain valleys near Mahábaleshvar.

13. The Dnyánodayá (11), in its issue of the 14th May, writes:—Having had occasion lately to converse with the poor people occupying the mountain valleys near Mahábaleshvar, we could not but feel that Government does not do for them what they have every right to expect. The herdsmen in these valleys have, as they feel, inherited right to feed their cattle on the mountain sides, but this right was taken away when the forests were reserved. In order to feed their cattle in their former grazing grounds, these poor people have to pay Government a yearly tax of 8 annas per buffalo and 6 annas per cow. But this is not their only grievance. A harder one still is that as they are prohibited from burning over the mountain sides, the leaves of the trees cover the ground and the grass is prevented from growing, so that though they get the right of feeding their cattle in the reserves by payment of a tax, still their cattle can find but little to eat, and thus they have to suffer a still heavier loss. To top it all, Government, so far as we could learn, give them nothing back in return. There are no schools in these sparsely inhabited valleys, no wells dug at Government expense, no roads or other works which the people would feel was some return for the hardships imposed upon them. We believe, if Government would do a little more for them in providing wells where water is scarce, or in some other way involving moderate expense, these simple people would feel that they receive something in return, and would not feel so bitterly against Government as some of these do, and for which one can hardly blame them.

Government advised not to appoint Mr. Webb as a Presidency Magistrate at Bombay.

14. The Kaiser-i-Hind (85), in its issue of the 10th May, says:—The time has come when, in our opinion, the public should freely and unreservedly express its honest opinion on the question of the next appointment to the Chief Presidency Magistracy. The Chief Magistracy of a presidency town like that of Bombay is unlike an ordinary magistracy. A variety of the most intricate cases have daily to be adjudicated by the Chief Magistrate; and from the commercial and imperial importance of Bombay, cases oftener than not arise which require the most eminent legal qualifications for the post—such qualifications as the local Chamber of Commerce once detailed in a petition to Lord Reay. A counsel or magistrate well trained in the criminal law of the land, and besides possessing a fair knowledge of commercial cases arising from a variety of circumstances and transactions, more or less delicate, intricate and difficult, is the only person best qualified for that onerous and responsible post. It is a question whether Mr. Webb, whom rumour again points out as the lucky nominee, possesses all the qualifications which the post demands. Our own honest opinion is that he does not; and we think Government would lay itself open to reproach, and even public indignation, if it ventured to nominate him in the place of Mr. Cooper. His Excellency Lord Harris has only been a year old in office. He is not supposed to know anything of the merits or qualifications of those who may have applied for the post. The task of selection would, therefore, be most difficult. Of course, under such circumstances he will lean for advice on his responsible legal adviser. We have sufficient confidence in the judgment and legal acumen of Sir Raymond West to entertain the belief that he would not advise His Lordship to appoint any but the most qualified person. If popular rumour, however, is to be believed, there is some intention to give Mr. Webb a berth on the local Magisterial bench. Possibly, he may at first not be called to act as the Chief Magistrate. In all probability he will be appointed Third Magistrate, and after a short incumbency raised to the First Magistrateship. If such be the secret intentions of the Government, it would be a grave scandal. We do not hesitate to say that Government would be exposed to the just reproach of having abused its patronage. A gentleman of proved merit and ability should alone be selected for the post, and it would be inimical to public interests to appoint any other individual, never mind what influence he brings to bear upon the authorities. We could speak stronger on the question if we chose, but we advisedly refrain at present from doing so, believing that Government would have the good sense not to excite popular indignation by appointing the person who, as an acting incumbent on previous occasions, is not known to have displayed any such ability as to justify it in offering him the post permanently. Moreover, there has been no Native Magistrate on the bench since the retirement of Mr. Dosábhái Frámji, and it is high time that the Third Magistrate should be a Native. That there is more than one Native gentleman qualified for that post, goes without saying; and Government would be guilty of departing from the rulings of the Secretary of State if it failed to take the opportunity of making a Native nomination to the magisterial bench in the city. We trust our Native contemporaries and associations, who have bravely spoken before, will not be behind in expressing their opinion on the matter. Here is no question of taking care of Dowb. Neither is it a question of pure patronage. It is a question of ably and impartially dispensing criminal justice in a city where important criminal cases of all kinds and variety daily crop up—cases which, we repeat, only a trained lawyer of vast experience and possessing all the requisite qualifications could dispose of with satisfaction to the public and credit to himself. We doubt whether Government could adduce a single circumstance which it might urge in extenuation of the proposed appointment. Three or four appointments of such a nature, and it would soon bring into utter discredit the criminal administration of justice in the city. We repeat, this protest ought to be a sufficient hint to Government to desist from perpetrating a job of the kind we have referred to. Otherwise, a monster petition should be immediately prepared and forwarded to the Secretary of State, and Mr. Bryce or some equally able member requested to present it to the House of Commons with such caustic observations on the administration of justice in Bombay as may absolutely prevent the perpetration of such scandalous jobs. But we trust that there will be no such necessity and that Lord Harris, in whose solicitude to jealously watch public interests we have every confidence, will have the wisdom and independence to see that a properly qualified person is appointed to the Magisterial Bench of Bombay, that none of the distinct rules laid down for the filling in of the offices is cast to the winds or technically evaded. He must be impervious to all influences which would go to favour nominations of this character, which, it is needless to say, would soon shatter his reputation for administrative impartiality and political integrity.

15. The Arunodayá (19) and the Jagadádarsh (36), in their issues of the 10th May, disapprove of the rule promulgated by the Bombay High Court to the effect that persons who have passed the High Court or District Pleaders' Examinations and wish to practise in the Courts of any one district, will be granted Sanads for the district not applied for, but, for one which the High Court may think fit, on the ground that much inconvenience and loss would be caused to the pleaders, and requests the High Court to withdraw the rule.

The new rule of the Bombay High Court for granting Sanads to practise as pleaders in the districts disapproved.

16. The Muawin-i-Majma-i-Mahammadi (153), in its issue of the 4th May, says:—In the territorial changes effected in 1861, the Mukhtiarkarate of Matári and Tando Adam was converted into a Faujdári. Subsequently, this new office was also abolished, and the criminal work of those places transferred to táluka Hála. This arrangement has caused considerable inconvenience to the inhabitants of Matári. The First Class Magistrate of the táluka is always away from Matári, being either on tour or at some other station, while the Second and Third Class Magistrates hold their courts at Hála, which is 19 miles distant from Matári. This is a very inconvenient arrangement. It seriously interferes with the administration of justice by disinclining people from appearing as witnesses. Matári is a large town. There is a municipality in it. Its population, about six thousand souls, is greater than that of Hála. Many wealthy and respectable merchants reside in it. The hardship is still further aggravated by the Second and Third Inconvenience suffered by the people of Matári in Sind for want of a Criminal Court there.

Class Magistrates' tours. Even in a petty case, witnesses are dragged to a great distance. The number of criminal cases arising in Matári is also large. On this account, it is not only desirable but also necessary that Government should take steps to remove the hardship complained of. This can be easily done, without any extra cost to Government, by the appointment of an Honorary Magistrate at Matári, for which post many fit persons can be found in that town.

Remarks in connection with the composition of the Coroner's jury at Bombay.

17. While writing about the inquest that is being held by the Coroner, with the aid of a jury, on the bodies of two Pársi ladies, who either fell by accident or were thrown down from the Rájábái Tower at Bombay, the Kaiser-i-Hind (85), in its issue of the 10th May, writes:—Whatever may be the verdict of the Coroner's jury in the case of the deceased Bái Bachubái and Bái Perozbái, it strikes us to enquire whether there is any law or bye-law for the selection of jurors at a Coroner's inquest. We know absolutely nothing of the social position of the jurors empannelled. But it is open to us to raise the question whether it is the right sort of jury to arrive at a decision in a case which is evidently full of the greatest intricacies. Supposing for a moment that some one or more is or are held criminally liable in this lamentable episode, it is certain that the case will be first investigated by the Chief Presidency Magistrate, and then committed to the Sessions. The High Court will, of course, empannel a special jury to try the case. Now, does it stand to reason that where the highest criminal court summons a jury of some of the best known and most intelligent citizens to assist it in determining the guilt of the persons charged before it, the Coroner should be allowed to content himself with nine or twelve persons hap-hazardly picked up from the streets? In ordinary cases of inquest there may be no particular objection to such a procedure; but we doubt whether the ends of justice are satisfied by getting up a casual jury to investigate a case of murder or culpable homicide not amounting to murder—a case shrouded in mystery which may defy the legal ingenuity of even our ablest criminal lawyers? Remembering that it is on the preliminary investigation that the criminal prosecution eventually depends, there appears to us every necessity for giving the Coroner a jury almost similar in composition to a special jury. Has he or has he not the power to summon such a jury? If not, it is a question worthy of being publicly discussed. We think that more harm than good comes of holding a Coroner's inquest with the aid of such a jury as is now investigating the Rájábái Tower fatality case. Some of our lawyer citizens may be able to throw some light on the question.

Grievances of passengers by the coasting steamers of Messrs. Shepherd & Co. running between Bombay and Ratnágiri.

18. A correspondent of the Indu Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 11th May, says:—On the 24th April last two women wanted to travel from Ratnágiri to Bombay by a certain coasting steamer of Messrs. Shepherd & Co., but they were refused admission to the vessel in spite of their loud protestations that their babes being taken by their relatives, who preceded them on board the steamer, they should not be separated from their young children. Many passengers have frequently, particularly in the hot season, to wait at Ratnágiri for a day or two before they get a passage, on account of a paucity of steamers run by the company on this line. The convenience of a pier at Ratnágiri is urgently needed.

A complaint against the police of Saraspar, in the Ahmedabad District.

19. A correspondent of the Hitechchhu (83) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 14th May, complains that the police constables at Saraspar in the Ahmedabad District do not go on their beats at night, being evidently afraid of going about in the dark, and remarks that Brahmins, Baniás and other high-caste Hindus, of whom the police of this town is mainly composed, are chicken-hearted, and that on account of their inattention to their duties on the 8th instant some thieves set fire to a hay stack and robbed a Bania residing in Vásan Sheri the next day.

PART II.—Education.

Remarks on the support given by Government to education in India.

20. The Rást Goftár (86), in its issue of the 10th May, says:—The resolution of the Government of India reviewing the statistics of education for 1889-90 tells a very doleful tale. The permanency of British rule in India is in direct proportion to the extent of support the Government gives to education. The rulers are more alive to this fact than the ruled; yet it is to be noticed with great regret that the Supreme Government metes out with great stint their contribution to the education of the masses. During the year under review the Supreme Government have spent only £620,000 upon the education of the masses,—a sum which, as the Times of India says, was less than the cost of a single battleship and much less than the amount contributed as fees by the poor Indian scholars themselves who are the objects of Imperial munificence. This is a lie direct to those critics of the Government who miss no opportunity to din into the ears of the Government that in India they give education with foolish prodigality. What will these generous-hearted critics say to the fact that during the year the contribution of the Supreme Government to education was £180,000 less than the amount the scholars paid in fees. This amount was in excess even of what was furnished by the provincial revenues, which contributed only £760,000, whereas the amount realized by fees was £800,000, which was more than 25 per cent. of the total amount made up of provincial revenues, local funds, municipal funds, scholars' fees, and the contribution by the Supreme Government. The population of India is ten times that of England, yet in England the State contribution to education is double of that in India. The result of this insufficient State subsidy to education is the turn out of men who are not educated in the best sense of the word, and who are only a compromise between education and ignorance and do more harm to the Government than out-and-out ignorance does. We hope, therefore, that, in the interest of its own stability in the country, the Supreme Government will be alive to the wisdom of giving more open-handed help to education.

Disapproval of the new rules regarding grants-in-aid to private schools.

21. The Vártáhar (18), in its issue of the 10th May, disapproves of the new grants-in-aid rules which have come into operation from the current month, remarking that although an attempt has been made to show that Government have been liberal in framing these rules, there is nothing in them for which they deserve thanks, that Government have become liberal at the expense of the municipalities to whom the supervision of the primary aided schools, whose number is the largest of all private institutions, has been transferred, and that though the scale of grants has been nearly doubled the managers of schools will not be benefited so long as the rule laying down that the grant should in no case exceed one-half of the school's income or one-third of its total expenditure, remains intact. Moreover, the conditions, observes the Vártáhar, with regard to the admission of students have placed the aided schools at a great disadvantage.

PART III.—Railways.

A complaint about the overcrowding of third class railway carriages.

22. The Jáme Jamshed (84), in its issue of the 11th May, says:—The marriage season has begun among the Hindus. Numerous marriages are being celebrated in that community and consequently large numbers of Hindus travel by rail from one place to another. Notwithstanding the unusually large passenger traffic, a sufficient number of third class carriages is not to be found in the trains running long distances, and hence this class of carriages are found to be much overcrowded, putting the passengers to great inconvenience. This has happened in spite of the express orders of the Government of India issued five years ago, directing railway companies to provide proper accommodation to third class passengers. This grievance of the travelling public ought to be enquired into and removed by the Secretary to the Bombay Government in the Public Works Department (Railway Branch).

Part IV.—Municipalities.

Proposed house-tax at Belgaum.

23. The Chikitsak (26), in its issue of the 6th May, says that the Divisional Commissioner has asked the Belgaum Municipality to abolish octroi duties, replacing them by a house-tax; but as most of the residents of the town are poor cultivators of land they would not be able to bear this additional burden, and hence no house-tax should be imposed.

Complaints against the Kapadvanj Municipality in the Kaira District and a request to Government in the matter.

24. A correspondent of the Satyavakta (119), in its issue of the 15th May, says that the municipal servants at Kapadvanj in the Kaira District have not received their salaries for the last three months, owing, it is said, to want of funds in the municipal treasury, and requests Government to abolish the corporation. The correspondent condemns the alleged intention of the corporation to enhance the house-tax.

Part V.—Native States.

Proposed annexation of Manipur disapproved.

25. The Indu Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 11th May, writes:—"Let us hope," said Sir Charles Aitchison in a speech delivered shortly before his retirement, "that the days of annexation are gone." He, perhaps, thought that the annexation of Burmah was the last of its kind, and hoped there would be no more of it. He little thought there would be a fresh morsel placed before the British Lion, and that the ever greedy animal would look wistfully at it and see if he could quietly gulp it down. English papers are silently hinting the policy of annexation. The Manipuris have no tincture of civilization, not as much as Tartars, and it is the duty of the British in India to reduce them to civilization—such is the style of reasoning adopted by that mealy-mouthed philanthropist, the Spectator of London. But we think His Excellency Lord Lansdowne is not the man to jump to that conclusion. We think he realises the blunder which was committed by his officers, and which gave rise to the unpleasant affair. The accounts that have come out show that there was serious bungling somewhere. The British took the offensive first and the Manipuris retaliated in self-defence, and when they saw the weakness of their opponents they took the offensive on their account. The massacre of English officials was a heinous crime, and for that, those responsible for the crime should be punished, but not the people of the Manipur State. The people are not at fault, and it would be unjustifiable if the Government made them suffer for Jubráj's folly. The Government has already proclaimed amnesty to the people, saying that their quarrel was not with the people but with the Princes who had offended them. If after this the people find that their State is annexed, and if they then rise en masse against the British, who will be in the wrong—the Manipuris defending their hearths and homes, or the British adding insult to injury? Annexation, we know, has its advantages. It brings the people under the healthy influence of Western thought. It inspires them with higher ideas of government and citizenship. In a word, it awakens the national mind. But it has its heavier disadvantages. It destroys self-government. It degenerates the people and makes them resourceless, uninventive and ever-dependent, and it gives no opportunities to men of administrative capacity. Our remarks will be clear when we allude to the narrow field open to Indians in British India, and to the life of a great Marátha statesman who recently passed from amidst us. Sir T. Mádhav Ráo found a career, not in British India, but in Native States. If the red line in the map of India were not interrupted here and there, what would Sir T. Mádhav Ráo have been? He would have been one of those many flowers which are born to blush unseen. He would have wasted his sweetness on the desert air of the British Indian public service. Again, is not annexation an evil from an economic point of view? Is not the material condition of the people of some of the Native States infinitely better than that of British rayats? Is there in Native States such a large proportion of the population going on insufficient food from year's end to year's end as is officially admitted to exist in British India? These are serious questions, which go a great deal against the policy of annexation. Lord Lansdowne is a calculating and shrewd statesman, and we have no doubt he will consider the Manipur question carefully. Is it necessary to remind him of what the Proclamation of 1858 vouchsafes to the Indian peoples in the following clause?:—"We desire no extension of our present territorial possessions, and while we will permit no aggression upon our dominions or our rights to be attempted with impunity, we shall sanction no encroachments on those of others." These are noble words, ignobly disregarded by title-loving Viceroys. But Lord Lansdowne, we hope, will rise superior to motives of personal aggrandisement and will not allow himself to be misled into the policy of annexation. [The Phœnix (5) of the 9th and the Gujarát Durpan (80) of the 10th May also advise that the Manipur State should not be annexed to British Indian territories.]

26. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 10th May, writes:—Fresh light is thrown on Manipur affairs, and we regret to say that the most recent disclosures are such as to render intelligible the brutality of the Manipuris. We mourn with others the sad fate of Mr. Quinton and his companions. At the same time it is clear that the English put themselves in the wrong in the first instance. According to what has now been received as the correct account of the whole episode, it was resolved to seize the Jubráj in a full Darbár, to which he was to be invited as a friend. One fails to understand such an underhand proceeding—how it was useful, what necessity there was for it. If the Jubráj had offended, if his influence was prejudicial to British interests to an extent to make interference necessary, there were ways enough to call him to account or to checkmate him; there was a straightforward, above-board way of accomplishing the desired end. The Jubráj's power in the State was overgrown. The Chief Commissioner, who was sent by the Viceroy to make things straight, therefore deputes Mr. Grimwood, the Resident, who was always on friendly terms with the Jubráj to arrest him in a full Darbár, ostensibly called for another purpose. In the history of the occurrences we find a great want of judgment in more places than one. If there had been open warfare and Mr. Grimwood had been a soldier, he would not have hesitated, we believe, to meet his personal friend on the battle-field. It was another thing to ask him, nay command him, to meet him in the guise of a friend for the purpose of arresting him. It was a revolting task. He expressed his unwillingness for it. But seeing that his request was not heeded, like a loyal officer he undertook the odious duty. The selection of Mr. Grimwood for the chief actor in such a scene was objectionable on two grounds. One of them has already been mentioned. It refers to the officer himself. The other ground refers to the Jubráj. It never occurred to the Chief Commissioner to consider well beforehand what the Jubráj, the Manipuris, the whole of India, would think of the English idea of friendship and fairness. The conception of the plan was a gratuitous insult to the British name, because, even taking for granted that an arrest, and an arrest in the Darbár, was inevitable, other hands than those of an intimate private friend could have been easily found for the performance of the deed. If the Jubráj and his friends looked upon the movements of the British as not wholly honourable, no unbiased reader can blame them. The next step for the Jubráj was to meet what he considered treachery with treachery. If his hands are imbued with blood, if he has been guilty of a ghastly act of barbarous cruelty, he has done no more than what savage natures like him have often done before, in India and out of India. The precedent circumstances that led to the perpetration of the atrocity do not palliate the offence. But it must be confessed with a sense of deep regret that a little better statesmanship would have easily prevented two disastrous evils, the death of the officers and the equally great evil of the British name being tarnished by the memory of unworthy means employed to compass a perfectly legitimate purpose.

27. The Gujarátí (81), in its issue of the 10th May, writes:—The Englishman publishes a narrative full of deeply interesting information derived from the only survivor who has a knowledge of the circumstances which ultimately ended in the massacre of Mr. Quinton and his party. From this account it appears that the Government of India had instructed Mr. Quinton to do precisely what Lord Cross declared his unwillingness to believe had been attempted by them. On the 22nd April last the Secretary of State for India observed in the House of Lords, "He did not believe that the Indian Government ever intended that the Jubráj was to be summoned to a Darbár for the purpose of being arrested, and he would be greatly surprised if that was what had been done." If the account of the Englishman is to be believed, not only Lord Cross but the whole public of India and England will be painfully surprised that our most highly civilized and moral Government should have resorted to a line of policy which many will find it difficult to characterise in sufficiently strong terms of condemnation. The officialised organs of opinion, which affected so much virtuous indignation against what they called the 'treacherous' attack on British officers by the Senápati, will have now ample time for deciding, if at all they are capable of honest thinking on such questions, if that barbarian of a commander does really deserve all the epithets that have been hurled against him. As yet it is not quite clear what the precise relations have been between the Indian Government and the Manipur State. It is, however, pretty certain that during the last thirty years Government has recognised the de facto ruler without caring to enquire whether he was the rightful owner of the throne or otherwise. They allowed nearly six months to elapse since the outbreak of the revolution at Manipur and the expulsion of the Mahárája, who is now living as a suppliant at Calcutta. No steps whatever were taken during this whole period to restore the fugitive Mahárája, and, as a matter of fact, most friendly relations seem to have subsisted between Mr. Grimwood and the Senápati, the author of the revolution. Some mysterious desire, however, appears to have suddenly seized upon the Supreme Government to send a mission to Manipur headed by Mr. Quinton, with instructions to arrest the Jubráj in open Darbár, convened to all outward appearances for some solemn ceremony. How far this account is to be believed will be decided in a few days, when all the papers in connection with the whole shameful business will be placed before Parliament. We fail to see why Government has so long concealed from the public what precise instructions they had issued to the Chief Commissioner. Surely, the people of India, who must have contributed some lákhs of rupees for the fateful mission to Manipur, are entitled to know everything about the purposes for which their money is spent. The public must, however, wait till the papers are placed before Parliament, and it may be also desirable to suspend our judgment till that time. But no grounds have yet been shown, though clever attempts are certain to be made to prove the incorrectness of the version now given to the public in the columns of the Englishman, why it should be disbelieved. How the proposal made to Mr. Grimwood to arrest the Jubráj must have pained him can be easily realized from the fact that, after Mr. Quinton's arrival at Sengmai, both Mr. Grimwood and Lieutenant Simpson, who happened to be a guest at the Residency, had gone on a shooting expedition organized for them by the Jubráj himself. The incident about Mrs. Grimwood's protest against her husband being called upon to perform what was undoubtedly a painful task, viz., to arrest the Jubráj in Darbár, is capable of easy verification from that unfortunate lady herself, who seems to have bravely faced the difficulties of the situation after the disaster. The whole account recalls to one's mind parallel incidents in Indian history. But, for the present, it would be prudent to wait for the contents of the despatches of the Indian Government now on their way to England before instituting any such comparisons. It is significant that the shrieking official ventriloquists, who were boiling with white indignation against the "treacherous" Senápati, have ceased screaming against him.

28. The Hitechchhu (83) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 14th May, observes:—It is popularly believed that the object of the Foreign Office in sending Commissioner Quinton was to arrest the Jubráj, and to acknowledge the Regent as the legitimate Rája in order to assume the complete management of the Manipur State. If the Manipur disturbance had not occurred, Government would have tried to misrepresent the real state of things by praising the Regent and condemning the Senápati, who would have been deported from Manipur under the plea of the well-being of the State. It is strange that Government should not have yet placed a detailed account of the disturbance before the Indian public, though they have taken care to forward it to England. Probably they are afraid that their garbled accounts will be contradicted in India and will afterwards carry no weight in Parliament. Notwithstanding the reply given by the Secretary of State for India to a question put to him in Parliament on the 1st instant that the Government of India had no intention to arrest the Jubráj at the Darbár, the statement made to the contrary by a correspondent of the Englishman, who, we think, is Mrs. Grimwood, seems to be more credible.

Suggestion to Government to leave Manipur to Native rule under the supervision of a Political Agent.

29. The Subodh Patrika (16), in its issue of the 10th May, writes :—The Manipur tragedy has had its origin in blunder; but with the close of the war the rule of blunder will, let us hope, come to an end. From one point of view, the extension of British territory is an advantage to the people of the newly acquired country, who get order and peace in the place of disorder and intrigue. At the same time, it leaves little scope for indigenous administrative talent to show itself. All things considered, Manipur ought rather to be left to Native rule, incorporated with British territory. The war and its immediate results shall have sufficiently restored British prestige in those parts. What may still have to be regained may, perhaps, be eked out by a temporary British administration. If a foundation is thus laid for an orderly and civilised government, Native rule may well be trusted to cherish and develope it under the supervision of a Political Agent.

30. The Gujarát Mitra (82), in its issue of the 10th May, considers that it was a serious mistake on the part of the military officers who accompanied the Manipur expedition to have insulted the idols before whom Mr. Quinton and his brave companions were cruelly murdered, and says that this insult is likely to spread great discontent among the Manipuris. The Mitra also supports the views recently advocated by Sir J. Johnstone, late Political Agent, Manipur, in the Times for either reinstating the dethroned Mahárája Surchandra Singji or placing his son on the gádi under the supervision of a strong Political Agency. [The Svadesh Bandhu (126), in its issue of the 13th May, expresses similar sentiments, and the Poona Vaibhav (53) of the 10th May observes that the Manipuris are not solely to blame for the revolt, and if in taking revenge the British officers have destroyed the images of their gods the whole Hindu community will be dissatisfied.]

Appointments in Káthiáwár.

31. The Káthiáwár Times (3), in its issue of the 9th May, writes :—So far as Káthiáwár is concerned, the Bombay Government Gazette of Thursday last is of immense importance, as the nominations are such as would give satisfaction all round. The appointment of Colonel G. E. Hancock to the Political Superintendentship of Sávantvádi is fully deserving; and his appointment to act as Political Agent, Káthiáwár, is no less so. The confirmation of Mr. F. C. O. Beaman as Judicial Assistant to the Political Agent, Káthiáwár, will be very much appreciated by the people of this province, where Mr. Beaman's sense of justice has so greatly inspired confidence. Mr. P. S. V. FitzGerald, too, gets justice in being appointed First Assistant to the Political Agent, Káthiáwár. His removal from here, temporary as it was, was a distinct loss to this province, for there are very few officers with Mr. FitzGerald's rare tact, ability and experience whom Government can safely look to in troublesome times.

The minor Chief of Wádia, in Káthiáwár, and his education.

32. The Arunodaya (19), in its issue of the 10th May, says :—The minor Chief of Wádia, in Káthiáwár, has been sent to the Rájkumár College for being educated, and Mr. Sárábhái has been appointed his tutor. The mother of the minor, who is also his guardian, believes that this tutor has been fomenting quarrels between the minor and her, and had petitioned the Political Agency to remove the minor from under his tutorship. But the reply received by this lady shows that little respect is shown by Government officers to the wishes of Native Chiefs. [The Jagadhitechchhu (37) of the 9th and the Bodh Sudhákar (8) of the 13th May express similar sentiments and hope that the Government of Bombay will soon remove the tutor.]

A gang of robbers in the Dhrángadra and Bajána States, in Káthiáwár.

53. A correspondent of the Satyavakta (119), in its issue of the 15th May, observes:—It is said that a gang of badmashes surreptitiously moves about in the States of Dhrángadra and Bajána, kidnapping young children and otherwise annoying the people of those States. The correspondent requests the authorities to bring this gang to book.

The Pramod Sindhu (1), in its issue of the 8th May, regrets that a very large portion of the province of Berár should suffer from commercial inactivity on account of an absence of roads in that province, though the funds at the disposal of the Berár administration for the proper improvement of the province are quite sufficient for making useful roads and other improvements, and observes that in the absence of a macadamized road from any direction to the reserved forest situated at the distance of a few miles to the east of Amráoti, this town and several villages depending upon this forest for their fuel and grass supplies have, on account of the approaches to the reserve being most rugged, to overcome great difficulties in obtaining the necessary supplies from it, particularly in the rainy season.

Absence of proper roads in Berár deplored.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ā) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Proposed appointment of an English Barrister to the vacancy caused by the retirement of Mr. Justice Scott from the Bombay High Court disapproved, and the confirmation of Mr. Justice Farran recommended.

1. The Rást Goftár (86), in its issue of the 17th May, writes:—The Bombay Gazette hears that the Home authorities are going to do a job by appointing an English Barrister to the vacancy caused by the retirement of Mr. Justice Scott from the bench of the Bombay High Court. They want to reward a party man, it is said. We think it is only fair that they should turn their eyes somewhere nearer home for rewarding any service done for one or other of the political parties in England. India has nothing to do with it. We do not know what sort of a man he is whom the Conservative Government wish to reward with this big judicial prize. But whatever his merit, his appointment will be an unjust supersession of Mr. Farran, who has acted for Mr. Scott and who has discharged his duties with singular ability, to the perfect satisfaction of lawyers and litigants alike. Mr. Farran earned the golden opinions of lawyers for the soundness of his judgments, and, apart from the question of personal injustice, it would be a pity to throw away such a man for one whose principal claim to the office seems to be his services as a party politician. [The Kaiser-i-Hind (85), in its issue of the same date, expresses similar sentiments.]

2. The Dnyán Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 18th May, writes:—A telegram from the London correspondent of the Bombay Gazette dated the 12th instant states that the Secretary of State for India has decided to grant Mr. Arthur Crawford, late of the Bombay Civil Service, an annual allowance of one hundred and fifty pounds in consideration of his long services to the State. If the long services rendered to the State by Mr. Crawford during a period of well nigh thirty-five years did really merit some adequate recognition of those services at the hands of the State (and we do not believe that any person will have the hardihood to deny that he rendered very meritorious services to the State), the allowance now granted to him must doubtless be regarded as extremely paltry. It should not be forgotten that, so far as the charges of corruption were concerned, he came out of the ordeal with flying colours, and that the Secretary of State, even though invited by Lord Reay's Government to set aside the unanimous verdict of Mr. Justice Wilson's Commission, refused to disturb their verdict in any way, so far as the charges of corruption were concerned; while, as regards the charge of having borrowed from Native subjects of Her Majesty within his jurisdiction, it should not equally be forgotten that on two previous occasions, the latter occasion being as late as 1884, the Bombay Government had condoned his notorious indebtedness and had allowed him to compound with his creditors. Under these circumstances it is scarcely fair to visit his comparatively venial offence with so heavy a penalty as that involved in the loss of nearly six-sevenths of the pension to which he would in the ordinary course have been entitled. The principle of granting him some allowance having been accepted, it would, we are inclined to fancy, have been more graceful on the part of the Secretary of State to have allowed him some decently handsome proportion of the pension, at least one-half if not two-thirds of £1,000 which he would have obtained if he had but retired at any time before March 1888. It is to be hoped that the Secretary of State will yet see his way to do the needful in this direction. The justice of our contention will be readily admitted by all when they remember that the self-incriminated officials, who have been dismissed the service because of their undisputed criminality, have been more than fully compensated for their loss of office, when, as a matter of fact, they scarcely deserved the consideration shown to them.

Disapproval of the grant of a pension to Mr. A. T. Crawford.

3. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 17th May, says:—Apart from the question whether the India Council has acted wisely in giving a pension of £150 a year to Mr. Arthur Crawford after he had been dismissed from the service, the manner in which that pension has been given will hardly do credit to the authorities concerned. They wait for more than a year, allow public feeling to subside, and when everybody has nearly forgotten the case they quietly give him a pension because of his services to the State! This is hardly fair to the Government of Bombay which adjudged Mr. Crawford guilty of the charges brought against him, nor is it consistent with the order of dismissal passed against him by Lord Cross. Why was not the question of granting a pension settled when that order was passed? One can hardly help suspecting that the Secretary of State and his Council purposely delayed settling the question. The object seems to have been to grant the pension after Mr. Crawford's official delinquencies have been nearly forgotten. [The Mahrátta (4) and the Arunodayá (19) of the same date, and several other Maráthi and Gujaráti newspapers of the week, also express their disapproval of the grant.]

Alleged rigidity of the rule which compelled Mr. Ollivant to return to India to obtain an extension of the three months' privilege leave.

4. The Rást Goftár (86), in its issue of the 17th May, writes :—The rigidity of the rule which compelled Mr. Ollivant to leave the bed-side of his dying wife in England and come out all the way to India, to stay here for a night in order to obtain the necessary renewal of leave, is painfully accentuated by the death of Mrs. Ollivant a few hours before her husband reached home. Perhaps the Secretary of State was unable to break the cast-iron rule in favour of Mr. Ollivant. Perhaps, he thought that if he once began to make exceptions other applicants might come to him for similar favour. But there is not the least doubt that if any case required to be treated as an exception, it was that of Mr. Ollivant. There was good and abundant reason why he should have been allowed a renewal of his leave without being obliged to observe the cruel formality of a voyage to India and back. We do not, at the same time, agree with those who ask Government to change the leave rule in view of this exceptional case. Mr. Ollivant went away on three months' privilege leave, and if he had wished to avoid coming out to India he might have got his leave converted into furlough. A correspondent of the Bombay Gazette very fairly observes that in the matter of leave rules the Indian Civil Service is exceedingly well off.

Revival of the Cotton Frauds Act desired.

5. The Jáme Jamshed (84), in its issue of the 21st May, approves of the proposals submitted by Mr. H. E. M. James, Commissioner, N. D., for the revival of the Cotton Frauds Act, observing that in the interest of the vast trade of this presidency in this staple article all sorts of frauds should be suppressed, encouraging, at the same time, improvements in the cultivation of this material by means of a short law on the subject which would protect the trade from undue interference of petty Government servants entrusted with the work of carrying out the law, and from a heavy duty on cotton exports for the expenses of the new department which ought to be shared by Government.

A public meeting held at Revdanda in the Kolába District to adopt a memorial to Parliament against the Age of Consent Act.

6. A correspondent of the Vártáhar (18), in its issue of the 17th May, says : - A meeting of over one thousand persons of all castes and creeds was held at Revdanda on the 10th instant to adopt a memorial to Parliament against the Age of Consent Act. The meeting was attended by the representatives of all the villages composing the Alibág Táluka. After a few remarks, pointing out the evil consequences likely to arise from the operation of the Act, had been addressed, a committee was appointed to take signatures to the memorial of the adult male population of the táluka, to send the memorial to Parliament, and to collect subscriptions in the táluka for carrying out the object of the meeting.

Alleged injustice done to Natives in filling up appointments of Deputy Magistrates in Bengal.

7. The Gujarát Mitrá (82), in its issue of the 17th May, observes :- The Indian Mirror says that at the competitive examination held at Calcutta in March last for the selection of candidates for the office of Deputy Magistrates, 5 Hindus and 1 Mahomedan were declared successful, but while the 4 Hindus who headed the list were appointed to posts on a salary of Rs. 50 each, two Christians who had failed to pass the examination were employed on a salary of Rs. 200 each. If this statement be true, the conduct of the Bengal Government is very shameful, being somewhat similar to that of the India Office in the matter of the grant of a pension to Mr. Arthur Crawford. Government seems to treat with indifference the complaints of the Natives, but they ought to remember the proverb that "Pride goeth before destruction" and avoid such conduct in future.

8. The Indu Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 18th May, writes:—It was rumoured some days back that the Provincial Conference—an institution of some standing now—would not be held in Poona this year, owing to the recent agitation in connection with the Age of Consent Bill; but, thanks to the energy of some of the leading citizens of that city, in spite of a strong opposition and in the face of many difficulties, they succeeded in holding the Conference. The Conference commenced its proceedings on Monday last in the Joshi Hall, and was attended by about ninety delegates, sixty of whom were from Poona alone, the remaining thirty being from Sátára, Khándesh, Násik, Sholápur, Ahmednagar, Inchalkaranji, Alibág, Thána, Ratnágiri, and Dhárwár. The election in the city this year was by the various municipal wards; but why such a large number as two-thirds of all the representatives was returned by the Poona electors cannot be ascertained. We think it was done, perhaps, with a view to form a majority in favour of a proposition against the Bill which the opponents of the measure intended to move at the Conference. The proceedings, which were in Maráthi, passed off in a very quiet and orderly way. Mr. Govind Dhondo Limaye of Sátára, who held a neutral position in the Age of Consent controversy, was elected President. In the commencement the Conference "placed on record its expression of profound sorrow at the untimely death of Mr. Charles Bradlaugh, whose noble championship of this country for the last three years will ever be remembered with deep gratitude by the entire Indian nation." At the first day's meeting the last year's resolutions on the subject of education, income-tax operations and ábkári administration, with the additional proviso to the last "that it is necessary that Government should take early steps to prohibit the opening of liquor shops at fairs, melás, jatrás, &c.," were re-affirmed with the view, as the mover said, to show Government that the grievances complained of were real and not imaginary. The next resolution was about the Salt Act of 1890. It was moved in this resolution to ask the Bombay Government to take early steps to so amend the definition of the word "manufacture" in the Salt Act of 1890 as to exclude all processes of cleaning and purifying salt from the scope of the Act, and to further amend the Act on the lines suggested by the Provincial Conference of 1889. The amendment as suggested in this resolution is, we think, essentially necessary, as it is a great hardship to the people inasmuch as they are liable to come into the clutches of law by simply cleaning and purifying impure salt for domestic purposes. The last resolution of the day was to secure despatch in the execution of the orders of municipal bodies, or of the executive side of municipal bodies, or of their executive committees; and with a view to strengthen generally the executive side of municipal administration, to amend the District Municipal Act to enable municipalities to delegate to their chief stipendiary officers any or all of their executive powers. The second day's sitting was rather a lengthy one, as, owing to excessive heat, it was intended to go through the whole programme at one sitting. The first subject taken up on that day was the police administration. After re-affirming the resolution of the previous year, viz., that adequate restrictions should be imposed on the discretionary powers of the police in regulating the proceedings of public meetings and of religious ceremonies and festivities, and that proper safeguards should be imposed in order that the powers of the District Magistrate under the Act should not come in conflict with the powers of municipalities under the Municipal Act, it was further resolved to request the Government to appoint a commission to enquire into the whole case of the police administration, as was done by the Bengal Government, and to base the new schemes of re-organization, if it be decided upon by the commission, upon the following lines, viz., that the police should be relieved of jail and treasury guard duties, which reduce the present available police strength for strictly police duties by nearly one-third, to have a more equal distribution of police in order to increase the efficiency of the present force for minimising crime and for the security of person and property; that the two branches of the

The Fourth Provincial Conference recently held at Poona.

Police Department, protective and detective, be kept separate; that the pay of the head constables, &c., be raised and that higher qualifications on the part of these officials be insisted upon; and finally, that the District and Assistant Superintendents be recruited partly by the appointment of members of the subordinate executive service. The next subject dealt with by the Conference was the Agriculturists' Relief Act and its intended extension. In connection with this subject the Conference expressed its strong opinion "that before any final action is taken in the matter by Government, the report of the Special Officer appointed to enquire into its working should be published to enable the public to submit their representations in the matter." The resolution also embodies the alarm with which the Conference learnt of the proposed abolition of the conciliation system under the Act. In regard to the long standing grievances of the railway employés and third class passengers, it was suggested to request Government to appoint a commission to enquire into them and to minimize the inconveniences under which they have been so long labouring. In connection with the forest laws, which formed the next subject for discussion, the Conference expressed its satisfaction at the recent resolution of Government subordinating forest officers to the control of the District Collectors in respect of those matters in which the wants and conveniences of the agricultural classes come in conflict with the interests of the forest revenue, but it expressed its regret at the oppressive policy of Government of imposing harsh restrictions on free grazing and on open forest areas, and suggested that Government should be requested to remove these restrictions without delay. It also suggested in the same resolution that Government should be asked to issue instructions to the forest officers in the Northern Circle to soften the rigour of their administration of forest laws. In connection with the fact of Government not adopting in their entirety the recommendations of the Forest Commission in regard to free grazing and ráb in the districts of Thána and Kolába and not deciding the question of trees in occupied numbers, "the Conference placed on record its regret that Government has not thought it proper to publish the whole of the Kolába Resolution of April 1890." The last resolution was about the protected age question, and it was moved by Mr. Tilak "that the Conference places on record its regret that the Government of India was not pleased to give due regard to the public opinion expressed about the Consent Bill." The Conference then authorized its President to submit to Government representations on its behalf embodying its resolutions on the following subjects:—Forest administration, ábkári administration, police reform, income-tax operations, salt tax, Municipal Act, the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act, and the conciliation system.

9. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 17th May, says:—So far as the proceedings of the Provincial Conference are concerned, matters appear to be improving. There is yet much room for improvement, but there was an assurance that this improvement would be effected, and it is this assurance that is more encouraging and creditable. The Conference unanimously admitted that it would be no good to go on ratifying previous resolutions and re-affirming principles about which there exists little difference of opinion. The rulers, apparently, hold that the suggestions which the people make about administrative reforms are impracticable. We hold otherwise, and unless we strengthen our case each year it is impossible that solutions of the several administrative problems can be brought nearer. The first difficulty in the way of progress is that one party alone speaks, while the other is allowed to hold golden silence. And the Conference is to be congratulated on the fact that it has resolved to make Government speak. The idea of memorialising Government in the matter of such subjects as require Government action is a good one, and we shall watch its working out with great interest. We only suggest that these memorials should be submitted in time to warrant a reply being received before the next Conference meets. Another distinguishing feature of this year's Conference was that it was not all opposition to Government. In the matter of the municipal resolution, as also in one or two other questions, the Conference supports Government, and we feel sure this support will be cordially accepted. The third interesting feature was the spirit of toleration which the assembled delegates exhibited. Throughout the proceedings a tendency was observable to contest the soundness of different views; but, on that account, there was no impatience shown to carry out the programme as settled. Full scope was given for the ventilation of opposite views, and resolutions were passed after mature deliberation. In the matter of the Agricultural Relief Act, ábkári, local self-government and the Consent Act, opposite views were expressed and votes taken. This, if we remember aright, was not done on previous occasions, and of this much credit is due to the President, who, we learn, is a Garbhádhánist and not a Sudhárak. We especially draw the attention of the public to the resolution on the Consent Act. The attitude taken there is such as cannot be objected to by the hottest reformer. When the Act was passed there was considerable jubilation in the reformers' party. In the exuberance of joy at the opposition being set at naught, they forgot that their own suggestions were treated with equally scant courtesy. The resolution passed by the Conference would show that sober judgment is once more beginning to assert itself. We thank the 'Sudháraks' for the moderation and toleration they showed on this occasion. In conclusion, we congratulate the Poona and mofussil delegates on the successful manner in which they managed the Conference.

10. The Gujaráti (81), in its issue of the 17th May, writes:—Some weeks ago there appeared in the Poona papers a discouraging announcement that the Provincial Conference would not be held this year on account of the dissensions between the opponents and advocates of the Consent Age Bill. We are, however, glad that the ominous predictions of the prophets of evil have been falsified and that the deliberations of the Fourth Provincial Conference which met on Monday last at Poona have successfully terminated without occasioning any split among the assembled delegates. The list of subjects laid before the Conference was sufficiently exhaustive, and more or less useful suggestions were embodied in the ferm of resolutions which were unanimously accepted by the delegates. One very striking feature in connection with the last Conference was the proposal to address separate representations to Government on some of the principal topics discussed by the delegates and thus to elicit an answer, favourable or otherwise, from them. The National Congress also took a similar departure last year, and we think that is the only method by which the deliberations of both the bodies can be rendered less academical, more informing and productive of some practical or tangible good in the shape of an authoritative reply from the authorities. As we have already acknowledged, the last Conference must be pronounced to be a success on the whole, especially when one recalls to mind the great discouragements amidst which Mr. G. K. Gokhale, Secretary to the Conference, had to work. Public thanks are due to him and the two other gentlemen who co-operated with him after Mr. Tilak had resigned his Secretaryship for some unknown and mysterious reasons and thus left his colleague to shift for himself. We have so far confined our comments to the good side of the Conference, and it now remains for us to notice what seem to us to be very serious defects in its constitution and procedure. Our observations in this regard are conceived in no captious or cavilling spirit, but are simply intended in the interests of the Conference itself. The last Conference was attended by about ninety delegates, sixty of whom were from Poona itself. It is indeed a satisfactory symptom of political activity in the city of the Peshwas that all the sixty delegates should have been elected by the various municipal wards, and in this respect the example of Poona may be profitably followed in other districts. Sátára sent ten delegates; Khándesh, Násik and Sholápur, three each; Ahmednagar two; and Inchalkaranji, Alibág, Thána, Ratnágiri and Dhárwár, one each. From these figures it is clear that the Conference can scarcely be called a Provincial Conference, and that its constitution needs considerable improvement. Poona monopolises nearly two-thirds of the entire number of delegates; some districts are very inadequately represented, and others not represented at all. For this, of course, the promoters are not to blame, as they had sent invitations to the leading citizens in each district and done what they could to secure adequate representation of all districts. An important province like Gujarát sends no representative at all. This is, indeed, very discouraging and shows in a convincing manner how its people are apathetic in political as in other matters. At the same time it must be said that the Conference had erred in laying down that its proceedings should be conducted in Maráthi, thus effectually preventing the Gujaráti-knowing public from taking part in its deliberations. We think if the Conference is to be a Provincial Conference in the real sense of the word and not a Conference of the Poona people, it is absurd to lay down such a rule. We fail to see why the system followed by the National Congress in this respect should not be adhered to in the Conference's deliberations also. Again, two Deccanis and a Mahomedan gentleman were selected to act as President during the last three years, and this year also a Deccani gentleman was elected President. We wish some leading representative member of the Gujaráti community had been nominated to that post. This would have been an effectual inducement to the indifferent members of that community to attend the sessions of the Conference. [The Surya Prakash (88), the Svadesh Bandhu (126), the Broach Samáchár (95), the Gujarát Mitra (82) and the Ahmedabad Times (89) of this week express similar sentiments; while the Gujarát Darpan (80) and the Hindusthán (105) of the 17th May censure the Conference for adopting the resolution in connection with the Age of Consent Bill, on the ground that a social subject ought not to have been brought before a political association. The Kesari (42), in its issue of the 19th May, considers the Conference to be a complete success and attributes the attack made on it by the Indian Spectator (2) to meanness and race jealousy, remarking that the observation of the Spectator in regard to the delegates to the Conference not having been properly elected is not worth notice.]

11. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 17th May, writes:—Poona politicans have played this time at provincial politics. Their last year's Provincial Conference cut but a very sorry figure, and its failure to present in time the intended address to His Excellency the Governor led to the exposure of the manner in which business is transacted by men who wish to have a share in the administration of the country. That exposure was regretted by many at the time, but lessons of the kind that His Excellency Lord Harris taught to Poona politicians are necessary to enable them to know themselves a little before trying their hands at State problems. This year's Conference at Poona has come and gone, and there is nothing particularly noticeable either in its resolutions or its harangues, except the motion it is reported to have unanimously adopted concerning the Age of Consent Act. That motion condemns the Government of India for not paying sufficient attention to public opinion in passing the law. Play-acting of this sort, through which the Poona Conference has just now gone, does harm to nobody. It may be mentioned that the Presidentship of the Conference had been offered to Mr. D. E. Wácha, but he declined to have anything to do with it on hearing that the Conference was going to pass a resolution condemning the Age of Consent law. He has acted wisely. Neither Bombay nor Gujarát joined the Conference, and, as for the men who assembled at it, they were delegates from the places whence they came in the "usual" sense of the term. [The Rást Goftár (86) of the same date expresses similar sentiments.]

12. In approving of the rule lately passed by the Bombay High Court reserving to the Court selection of a district when issuing a sanad to practise in a District Court, the Praja Mat (115), in its issue of the 16th May, says that since in some of the Subordinate Judges' Courts in the Ahmedabad District the number of pleaders is very small and the pleaders charge exorbitant fees, the Honourable Judges of the High Court will do well to allot a certain number of Vakils to each Court and to keep up the number.

The new rule of the Bombay High Court for granting sanads to practise as pleaders in the districts approved, and a further request made to the Honourable Judges in the matter.

13. The Indu Prakásh (18), in its issue of the 18th May, writes:—The University Tower tragedy continues to occupy the anxious attention of the Pársi community. In spite of the patient enquiry that is being made by the Coroner, and the elaborate theories as to why and how the unfortunate young women met with death propounded by some of our contemporaries, nothing reliable so far has been elicited. The incident is doubtless unfortunate and the shroud of mystery in which it is veiled is calculated to suggest many a wild conjecture, but the excitement which it has caused among the Pársi community is, we think, much too great, considering the real significance of it, which is altogether small. A fund has been started by some of our Pársi citizens to aid in the search of evidence. It is a virtuous impulse, but probably a superfluous stimulus. A monument is suggested to be raised to the two unfortunate young women. We should not wonder if in the heat of excitement money flows out readily from the pockets of our Pársi friends, but it would be wiser, we think, to wait.

14. The Kaiser-i-Hind (85), in its issue of the 17th May, says:—When we indited our article on the subject of the Rájábái Tower fatality last week we earnestly hoped that the police would be able to trace the criminals to their lair and lay bare the whole mystery in which the shocking tragedy till then was shrouded. A week has since gone by and we are grieved to find that the police has done next to nothing in that direction. On the contrary, from the evidence given by the Coroner's Surgeon, it is plain that the police is obstinately determined to cling to the theory of the nail marks and indentations on the bodies of the deceased having been caused by a fall. Whether the fall was accidental or intentional is still an undecided problem. So also the question whether the girls were thrown down the tower balcony by some rascals. We also observed that most of the witnesses brought forward,—such as the sepoys, the Gowlee, the Chokrás et hoc genus,—were not creditable to the detective ability of the police. We had hoped that in the interests of truth and morality the police would be found equal to the occasion and unravel the mystery. But, like Asláji, it defies the public. It puts in a plea of non possumus, and, apparently, invites the public to accept the theory to which it mysteriously clings from some motive or other unexplained. The evidence of the Coroner's Surgeon is inconclusive. Mr. Craigie was able to elicit from him by dint of persistent cross-examination the statement that the injuries might have been caused by an assault or attempt at assault on the bodies of the girls. The rest of the evidence, barring that of the Pársi doctors and the relatives and friends of the deceased, is more or less suspicious and inconsequential. If, then, this be the kind of evidence which still remains to be brought before the Coroner, we loudly demand that the sooner that official closes his enquiry and sends to Government his report on the absurd attitude assumed by the police the better for the ends of justice. For, with such police there could be no hope of a clue. Public time is being needlessly wasted, while the object of the investigation is in no way advanced. Nay, on the contrary, it seems to be defeated. A Judge of the High Court is reported to have once observed that, given the police a certain theory to start with—be it ever so absurd, be it a perfect will-o'-the-wisp like the one it is now persistently and obstinately trying to make out—given such a theory, it need not surprise any one to see a perfect edifice of evidence constructed to corroborate it. It would seem that the truth of that shrewd and experienced observation is being amply illustrated in the present lamentable case. We see it painly that, with an infatuation which is perfectly amazing, the police hopelessly tries to rear the structure of accident on its fancied theory, while there is sufficient presumptive evidence to proceed on the other and more generally accepted theory of assault—notwithstanding what twenty editors of the Bombay Gazette may say to the contrary. It is, indeed, most strange that paragraphs should have day after day appeared in that respectable journal, blindly advocating the theory set up by the police. Wonders never cease. Such being the attitude of the police, it now remains for the public to appeal to the Government to relieve those who are now conducting the investigation and entrust the task to other persons who may be utterly unprejudiced. Provided the relatives and friends of the deceased are prepared to undergo the expense, we should suggest assistance from Calcutta or Europe. For, it is a positive scandal that those to whom is entrusted the protection of the lives of our citizens should behave in the manner they seem to do. We were most anxious to give the Bombay Police every credit. We were disposed to consider it not such an abused body as it has been made out by the mob. We are still ready and willing to give it an opportunity to redeem its reputation by detecting this foul and murderous crime, if only it would discard its favourite theory which is not yet established, and go on the one which popular opinion points to. Otherwise, we must unhesitatingly say it will be a scandal and a black spot in the criminal history of the city—these deaths remaining a mystery. We are of belief that they are not so mysterious as they seemed at first. If only the police went on the right track to unravel the mystery, there was nothing to prevent its being dragged very soon from the obscurity in which it is now allowed to lie. We take it to be an important administrative question whether the police, if it chose, could sit astride and defiantly refuse to take any steps whatever to detect the foulest of crimes, because, in its caprice, it thinks no attempt could discover the offenders? We ask whether the police is the master of the public that it should behave so? Is it bound to respect public opinion and follow it, or is it bound to act as it may suit its whim or preconceived or premeditated notions? In the name of justice, we ask whether the Government is prepared to sit down with folded hands, blind eyes, and deaf ears on the occasion; or is it prepared to take notice of the police and bring it to bay? In short, is the Government going to wear bangles and shawls and allow the police to cool its heels while murder and rapine stalk free about the streets of Bombay? If the force is so recalcitrant and disobedient to authority, is it worth while maintaining it? What has the Municipal Corporation to say to this discreditable state of affairs? Could the police not be disbanded? Could not the Government perform a lustration and reorganize the police of Bombay on a better and more disciplined footing? This is the question the public should discuss. Bombay cannot pay the whole piper for the police establishment, and, at the same time, tolerate a state of inefficiency which may lead to the committal of the foulest crimes in broad open day-light on unprotected respectable women. For the sanctity of home, for the sanctity of the wives, mothers and daughters of Bombay, we loudly demand that the Government should at once set on foot an independent and unprejudiced enquiry. [The Káthiáwár Times (3), in its issue of the 20th May, expresses similar sentiments.]

15. The Rást Goftár (86), in its issue of the 17th May, writes:—What is the business of the police? It is to detect crime. In the Rájábái Tower enquiry they have put aside this function and are working heart and soul to prop up a preconceived theory of their own. They have no reason to assume that any one theory regarding the fatality is more probable than another. Even if the probabilities were really in favour of their own pet theory, it is a dangerous misconception of their duty to work up to it, as if no other way to account for the fatality were possible. It is the duty of the police to work upon the assumption that a crime has been committed, unless the contrary is proved. Is the contrary proved here? Is it beyond the possibility of a doubt that there was no foul play? Of the three suppositions, that of foul play is still the most probable, and yet the police are apparently spending all their energy to prove that it was anything but foul play. Their action practically amounts to this that they have unconsciously set themselves up as advocates of the criminals, if criminals there be. The position which the police seems to have taken up is that of determined opposition to the suggestion of foul play. It is not their duty thus to work in support of a particular view, without any clear and overwhelming evidence to show that that is the correct view and none other. It is not their business to take sides. It is not the interest of any one to work for any particular theory more than another. It is the interest of everybody to learn the truth about a mystery which is still as far from solution as ever it was before. The attitude of the police will not help to solve the mystery. We appeal to Colonel Wilson, Commissioner of Police, to instruct his subordinates as to their proper duty in connection with this sad business. If the poor girls were the victims of a crime, already much precious time has been lost in going off the scent. Our worthy Commissioner will see that, if there was a crime, it was a crime of an appalling and exceptional nature, and the reputation of the police hangs upon the detection of it. The Bombay Police have given many proofs in the past of their detective skill and resourcefulness, and the present occasion demands their exertion to the utmost. The pity of it is that they are exerted not quite fully. [The Indian Spectator (2) and the Satyá Mitrá (118) of the same date express similar sentiments.]

16. The Bombay Samáchár (93), in its issues of the 20th and 21st May, says:—In the first place, the Bombay Police failed to make on the day of the fatality at the Rájábái Tower careful enquiries into the diverse circumstances connected with the tragedy. Again, the police has been stubbornly sticking to the theory that the deceased have not been the victims of an indecent attack, and all the evidence produced by it before the inquest has been of a nature whose sole aim is to support this theory. The conduct adopted by it at the inquest, moreover, puts it more in the position of an advocate of the undiscovered murderer or murderers, if any, than in that of persons making due attempts to unravel a confounding mystery and find out the truth. Some of the witnesses were cross-examined by the police in a manner that strongly smacked of an attempt to suppress the efforts made to bring forward the true solution of the mysterious occurrence, and the Coroner found himself compelled to exercise some sort of control over such objectionable behaviour of the police. It seems rather strange that the Commissioner of Police should have taken no notice of this conduct of his subordinates who have been entrusted with the work of ascertaining the truth. It is to be not a little regretted that the Bombay Gazette should have followed the objectionable course of commenting from day to day on the evidence of individual witnesses so as to support the theory of accident wrongly entertained and so stubbornly stuck to by the police. The Gazette wonders that the Pársi girl Navázbái, whose very important evidence was recorded before the inquest the day before yesterday, should have been produced at such a late hour of the enquiry. There ought, however, to be no wonder at all in this matter. It has been well known to the public for several days past that important evidence was to be given by certain Pársi children in connection with the tower tragedy, and comments were freely made on the nature of the evidence they were to give. The police was well aware of this and the wonder is that it did not produce these children before the Coroner. An explanation ought to be forthcoming from the police why it failed to bring these children before the inquest. The complaint made by Mr. Brewin and supported by the Bombay Gazette that nobody gave information to the police regarding these children witnesses is rather strange, since it shows that the police is incapable to collect information about a crime by its own exertions and has to depend upon the good will of individuals for the collection of same. The Gazette rightly remarks that by producing these important witnesses at so late an hour of the enquiry an opportunity has been given to the abettors of Mánakji Asláji, if there were any, to make themselves scarce, but the fault of this lies with the police. [The Jáme Jamshed (84), in its issue of the 19th May, also censures the police for its conduct in this matter.]

17. The Kaiser-i-Hind (85), in its issue of the 17th May, writes:—We have shown that Dr. Sydney Smith's evidence is almost wholly inconclusive and beyond ordinary belief so far as it refers to the nail marks on the bodies of the unfortunate girls in the Rájábái Tower fatality. No sane person, be he a medical man or a layman, would for a moment believe it. But it was in the power of the Coroner's Surgeon to have assisted the public in unravelling the mystery instead of entirely relying on the hitherto unproven hypothesis with which the police has started and to which it is determined, in defiance of public opinion, to adhere. After severely censuring the Coroner's Surgeon for failing to make a minute and searching examination of the clothes of the deceased and for arriving from a cursory examination at the conclusion that the clothes could have been torn by the fall from the tower, the Kaiser-i-Hind continues:—Thus, it is a miserable fiasco, this precious evidence of the Coroner's Surgeon. For all practical purposes it is utterly valueless. Our common sense refuses to pin faith to it. Half a dozen instances of evidence of this character and the whole system of holding Coroner's inquests would be brought into utter contempt and ridicule. In fact, this inquest has revealed a number of weak points to which we cannot but draw the attention of the public and the high authorities with a view of having a better and more effectual procedure introduced which may be the means of discovering criminality and securing justice. Firstly, the absolute necessity of leaving dead bodies untouched exactly in the position and the condition where they may have fallen. Neither the public nor even the police ought to be allowed to disturb them till the Coroner is on the scene and has taken full notes. Secondly, clothes should be first accurately described and notes taken of them by the Coroner himself in person. When removed, they should lie with him and never leave his possession even for a minute till brought into evidence. Thirdly, the examination of clothes should be made in the presence of the Coroner. They ought never to be sent by the hands of the police either to the Chemical Analyser or the Coroner's Surgeon or both. The police is as much liable to tamper with them as not. Anyhow we would entirely distrust the police in such grave matters. Fourthly, medical examination by the Coroner's Surgeon should be also made in the presence of the Coroner and two or three other unimpeachable medical experts. It should be remembered that doctors disagree. And in cases of such a character as the one now under investigation, the mere ipse dixit of the Coroner's Surgeon should never be taken as authoritative or conclusive. Neither should there be a hole and corner examination, be it by microscope or any other means or instrument. The public can have no confidence in such, unless there were at least two or three other independent and competent medical men unconnected with the police. Fifthly, the police should have to do as little as possible with the keeping of clothes or with the entrusting of anything else most relevant to a fair enquiry. We would not trust the police in such matters, for we are of belief that it is liable to destroy evidence or mutilate it as it may suit its purpose. The Coroner alone,—a person of the stern integrity and thorough sterling independence of character of the present Coroner, should be the sole custodian of all personal belongings found on the bodies of deceased persons on whom inquests may be held. In fact, everything should be done in his presence so as to ensure absolute confidence that nothing is injured, made away, or destroyed. Sixthly, there should be some wholesome regulation for empannelling juries when inquests of importance are held. We think a jury should be composed of the same class of gentlemen from which our list of special jurors is annually made. The summoning should be entirely left to the Coroner and Coroner alone. We are now fully persuaded that, had such rules been observed in the present case, we might have ere this obtained a fair clue to the solution of the mystery and given the police the flattest contradiction touching its own fancied theory of accidental fall. Will the Government of His Excellency Lord Harris awaken its conscience and rise to do the duty which it owes to the citizens of Bombay? Or is it prepared to allow the irresponsible and capricious police to do what it likes? This is the question to which we now invite the attention of the public, the Police Commissioner, and the Government.

A complaint against some policemen of Dholka in the Ahmedabad District.

18. A correspondent of the Praja Mat (115), in its issue of the 16th May, complains that some policemen at Dholka forcibly take mangoes and other fruits from the villagers who bring their produce to market, and adds that a policeman recently took some fuel from a Dhed without paying for it.

Part II.—Railways.

The alleged causes of accidents on railway lines in the Bombay Presidency.

19. The Din Bandhu (9), in its issue of the 17th May, writes:—Although the frequent fatal accidents which have of late occurred on the railway lines in this presidency can legally and technically be attributed to the rash and negligent acts of railway servants, they are due solely to the present bad system of taking hard work from these employés. It is very cruel to work a man continuously for twelve hours from sunset to sunrise every day for months and years together, and it is wrong to expect him to discharge his duties, which are in themselves very onerous and numerous, without making any mistakes. Mill operatives get half an hour's respite every day as well as their holidays; officers and crew on board steamers have their four hours' watches, and policemen on night duty are relieved after every two hours; but a poor assistant station master, after he has once entered his miserable little office at 6 P.M., must nail himself to his chair, keep his eyes fixed on his telegraph or his train signal book with its thirteen columns, and pass 60 to 70 "up" and "down" trains, which means a train every 10 or 12 minutes. It is strange that our English dailies should not ventilate this subject with a view to obtain some relief to the overworked employés on our railways. We invite the attention of Government to this subject.

Grievances of third class passengers on the B. B. & C. I. and the G. I. P. Railways.

20. The Gujarátí (81), in its issue of the 17th May, says:—Of late, railway companies have begun to show so much disregard for the comfort and convenience of third class passengers that we think it is time that the public should take some measures for obtaining the needed redress from Government. Complaints have reached us from several quarters about the overcrowding of passengers on the B. B. & C. I. Railway line. Good many passengers have recently been compelled to return home on account of insufficiency of accommodation. The station masters know well enough that the passenger traffic in this season is enormous, and it certainly seems strange that the Company should not make adequate provision for meeting the increased demand for space. It is the third class passengers that pay the railway companies most, and it is precisely this class that is treated with scant courtesy by them. There is a special third class for Europeans on the G. I. P. Railway and the rates are specially reduced during Christmas. But the poor Native has neither any body to be kicked nor soul to be saved, nor has he any holidays to observe. He has no notion of either convenience or comfort and he can be treated in any fashion the servants of railway companies choose to adopt. But we expect Government to stand between the two impartially and help the weak against the strong, and we hope something will be done to redress the grievances of the sufferers. [The Surya Prakásh (88), in its issue of the 16th May, expresses similar sentiments.]

Suggestions for the removal of grievances of passengers on the G. I. P. and S. M. Railways.

21. The Sudhárak (17), in its issue of the 18th May, refers to the inconveniences and hardships suffered by Native passengers on the G. I. P. and S. M. Railways, and recommends that, like the detectives in the Police Department, a few Natives should be appointed to travel on these lines in order to note down and report to the railway authorities and Government the hardships suffered by passengers owing to neglect of duty or misconduct on the part of the railway employés or to any shortcomings in the railway management, and a special officer should be appointed to enquire into these complaints as well as into the grievances of traders, merchants and railway servants who fail to obtain redress at the hands of railway authorities. The Sudhárak also observes that the information annually published by Government on the working of railways is very meagre, and suggests that quarterly statements should be published giving due information on different heads of income and expenditure of the companies.

22. The Káthiáwár Times (3), in its issue of the 16th May, writes:—Punctuality on some of the railways seems to be quite out of the question. Again to-day we have no Bombay mail. The cause assigned for this is that the B. B. & C. I. mail train does not arrive punctually at Wadhwán, and that the Morvi railway trains cannot wait for it too long. If matters are as represented, we should like to impress upon the B. B. & C. I. Railway authorities the urgent necessity for their forthwith taking steps for the timely arrival of the mail train at Wadhwán.

Part III.—Municipalities.

Alleged improper conduct of the Mámlatdár of Tásgaon in the Sátára District at a municipal meeting.

23. The Chandánshu (24), in its issue of the 10th May, says:—A general meeting of the municipal commissioners of Tásgaon was held on the 5th instant to consider some municipal matters, when a discussion arose as to who should be appointed in place of Mr. Shinde, Head Master of School No. 1 at that town, transferred to Karád, and it was decided that the matter should be referred to the Deputy Educational Inspector. Ráo Sáheb Wágle, the Mámlatdár of Tásgaon, who was present at this meeting, proposed that one Mr. Chitnis should be appointed to the vacancy, but afterwards withdrew the proposal on his being convinced of its impropriety, addressing however some offensive epithets to the vice-president and some of the commissioners. It is said that the Mámlatdár intends to apologize for the offence in order to avoid serious consequences.

Affairs at Manipur.

24. The Sind Times (7), in its issue of the 17th May, says:—From whatever point the Manipur embroglio is contemplated, it is full of difficulties, which will be solved only when the whole of the papers are laid before the House of Commons, as promised by Government. There is a strong suspicion abroad that these papers, though promised in full, will be carefully edited before they are placed on the table of the House. For, if given in full detail, the probability is that they would place Government in a position of great difficulty. It will be impossible for the Government to defend, or even extenuate, the intended treachery towards the Jubráj; and it may not be found easy to make out that the Manipuris were in "rebellion" against Her Majesty, as has been pretended. Subjects may rebel, but such a course is not usually predicated of independent States, however great the disparity of the antagonistic powers. It is not easy, for instance, to imagine Switzerland rebelling against Germany, or Belgium against France. Ireland might rebel against England, for there the relationship of sovereign and subject exists, but not in Manipur. There is a great deal that requires explanation in relation to this Manipur business, and people will have to exercise their patience very long before full statements are placed, if ever they are, before the House of Commons.

25. The Indu Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 18th May, writes:—It is still early to form any opinion as to the propriety or otherwise of the conduct of Government in what they have done at Manipur. If the story published by the Englishman of Calcutta be correct by fifty per cent. discount, Mr. Quinton appears to have committed a very serious mistake. But until the full text of the Government despatches is available to the public, there can be no reliable basis for judging whether the instructions of the Foreign Office at Simla were conceived in a spirit of fair play. That Office, we suspect, must be at the bottom of much that has happened in Manipur territory of late. The code of the Political Department of the Government of India must undergo a thorough revision, especially that chapter of it which regulates its relations with the Indian Princes and Chiefs. The Native States of India have their own drawbacks, and these are unfortunately too many; but, we believe, at critical times the political officers attached to the States are, more often than not, found wanting in that capacity which springs from a genuine desire to support the cause of right. In the meanwhile, it is satisfactory to note that Manipur affairs have attracted attention in Parliament. Lord Ripon, than whom there is no greater friend of righteousness, has interested himself in the matter; and several members of the House of Commons also have interpellated Sir John Gorst, who, with his usual shifty manner of dealing with Indian matters, has so far not been good enough to vouchsafe any information tending to throw better light on the matter than what the public here has been able to obtain without the aid of the official torch light. But even Sir John Gorst cannot stand the imputation that England is a barbarous country, at least in its behaviour towards Asiatic people. Our readers probably remember that during the Afghan campaigns Sir Frederick Roberts came in for no small share of the indignation of the English public for his alleged acts of oppression and cruelty towards unoffending Afghan villagers. He was reported to have burnt villages and hanged and executed hundreds of poor villagers in Afghanistan simply to strike terror into the minds of the population and to impress them with the irresistible power of England. Such acts are justified on what we know to be the very inadequate and indefensible excuse of a wholesome example to Asiatic populations. On the present occasion there appeared in the London Times a statement that orders were given to burn Manipur villages; and Sir John Gorst was pressed to say whether, as a matter of fact, the statement was correct, and, if so, whether orders would be given that no villages should be burned down except where such a measure might be justified under the rules of civilized warfare. The reply, though not very satisfactory, is remarkable for the concession it makes in respect of the principles to be observed in English warfare in Asia. Sir John said in a very emphatic manner that he concurred in the principle that nothing should be done in the Manipur expedition "in a different manner from that in which a German column would probably act against France in a European war." These are important words, and we trust they will be always acted up to.

Opinion on the official despatches on the Manipur disaster condemning the policy of the Government of India.

26. In discussing the official despatches on the Manipur disaster which have been laid before Parliament, the Bombay Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 18th May, says:—Mr. Quinton and his party did not carefully ascertain before entering Manipur the exact disposition and strength of the Manipuris, and similar neglect on their part was observable until the disaster overtook the mission. In addition to this fault, there were two defects in carrying out the object of the mission: firstly, it was proposed to arrest the Jubráj without any intimation to that effect being given to the new Mahárája of Manipur after acknowledgment of the latter by the Indian Government; and, secondly, a darbár was held at which the Jubráj was to be apprehended. The first slip militates against the ordinary mode of transacting business with foreign powers, and an explanation on this point from the Government of India is urgently needed. The second mistake also goes against business routine, but a defence has been offered by the Government on this point. In defending the conduct of Mr. Quinton it has been asserted by the Government of India in their despatch to the Secretary of State for India that, the means adopted for the arrest of the Jubráj at a public darbár was the safest and honest. It is very hard to understand this explanation, which is not likely to be accepted by the people of India. This conduct of Government cannot be graceful towards a petty Native State, considering the former's great power and high position; and certainly it was neither straightforward nor honest. It has been hitherto believed by the Natives that the darbárs held by the British Government are peaceful gatherings for the due exchange of civilities, and they cannot understand why a different construction should be put upon the darbár held at Manipur. Should Government think of affixing to the word darbár a different meaning than the one generally accepted, it would mean that a darbár is sometimes made to perform the duties of the police, and this would startle and frighten the Native chiefs, princes and the people. It is, however, to be hoped that this strange interpretation has been adopted by Government solely in their great anxiety to defend the thoughtless and improper conduct of Mr. Quinton.

27. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 19th May, observes:—The opinion of the English press rightly inclines towards condemnation of the policy adopted by Government in regard to Manipur, denouncing it as exhibiting want of forethought. The Daily News is correct in charging Government itself with the responsibility of this censurable policy. The Supreme Government cannot be entirely acquitted, since it instructed Mr. Quinton to carry a small force with him, apparently in ignorance of the actual state of things at Manipur. Messrs. Quinton and Grimwood also neglected to take due precautions in carrying out the orders of the Supreme Government. The Commissioner and the Political Agent were so careless in this matter, that though the Jubráj was friendly towards them, they frightened him and made him turn into an enemy by their suspicious movements and thus brought the disaster on their own heads. It is to be much regretted that the Government of India should try to defend the serious mistake committed by Mr. Quinton in designing the arrest of Jubráj at a public darbár, and thus frighten the Native princes and people of India by announcing that a darbár could be legitimately charged with the work of the police. It is to be hoped that the Government of India will dispel this fear from among its subjects and tributaries by disavowing this strange construction on the objects of a public darbár.

28. Referring to the official correspondence published in the Supplement to the Gazette of India of the 16th instant with regard to the Manipur outbreak, the Dnyán Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 21st May, says:—This correspondence shows that the late Chief Commissioner of Assam inter alia proposed to arrest the Senápati in open darbár to which he was proposed to be invited as a friend and guest, and that the Government of India gave their deliberate sanction to the proposal the treacherous character of which has been admitted to the fullest extent even by the London Times and other Conservative journals in England. It is also extremely surprising that the Government of India should have taken something like six months since the alleged voluntary abdication, but practically the enforced retirement into private life or forcible deposition of the ex-Mahárája as the result of the successful revolt by his step-brothers, to arrive at the conclusion they did. One would have thought that, irrespective of the consideration whether the ex-Mahárája deserved to be reinstated or not on the gádi of his ancestors, the Government of India would have done well to take prompt and effective measures to adequately punish the chief author or authors of the revolt and those who contributed to the success of that revolt. But it would seem clear from the published correspondence that the representative of the British Indian Government at the Court of Manipur was a very staunch supporter of the chief author of the successful revolt of September of last year; and we are afraid that the Government of India have paid the heaviest penalty conceivable for their unpardonable slowness in dealing with the crisis. The correspondence also discloses very clearly the utter ignorance of the local authorities regarding the daring character and fruitful resources of the rebellious Senápati, who must naturally have been elated with the success of his design against his eldest brother, the ex-Mahárája. [The Gujarát Darpan (80) of the same date expresses similar sentiments.]

Destruction of some of the idols at Manipur by the British approved.

29. The Hitechchhu (83) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 21st May, condemns the heathen practice of offering human and other sacrifices to idols, censures the Manipuris who brutally murdered the British officers and sprinkled their blood on some idols, and is glad that the victorious British column has destroyed those idols, as this act will show the Manipuris that the idols that could not protect themselves are incapable to protect others.

Notice of the Parliamentary blue-book on the recent Cambay disturbances.

30. In noticing the official correspondence relating to the recent disturbances at Cambay that has been just laid on the table of the House of Commons, the Bombay Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 21st May, says :—The report of Lieutenant Mill, the officer in command of the detachment of the 5th Bombay Infantry, shows that the agriculturists who had collected in an unlawful assembly were incapable to confront the detachment, which received only a shower of brick-bats from the assembly, while thirteen agriculturists were killed and three times that number were seriously wounded. But other documents show that 20 persons were killed and 100 were wounded. No satisfactory explanation as to why so many lives were destroyed is to be found among the papers, and in the faint attempt made to render an explanation on this point the authorities contradict each other. Mr. Cooke, the Political Agent, and Mr. James, the Commissioner of the Northern Division, regret this loss, attributing it to accident. While Lieutenant Mill states that the mounted police of Cambay having refused to attack the rioters, the militaries had to perform that duty, it is asserted by the Bombay Government that the people attacked and routed the Cambay police, and while passing by the detachment were attacked by the militaries. These two accounts do not agree with each other; while Lieutenant Mill asserts the weakness and inability of the rioters, the Bombay Government describes the belligerent propensities and conduct of the riotous assembly. The Supreme Government in its despatch to the Secretary of State describes the occurrence in a manner quite differing from the descriptions of Lieutenant Mill and the Bombay Government, agreeing however with the public that excessive severity was used towards the rioters. It is therefore to be hoped that the disinterested parties who have been trying to secure justice to the unfortunate agriculturists of Cambay will not slacken their efforts and will succeed in getting redress of the grievances.

31. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 22nd May, observes :—In its despatch to the Secretary of State for India Mr. Shámrdo N. Laud, the Diwán, is described by the Government of India as "a well-meaning but injudicious administrator." This description does not tally with the opinion recorded by the Supreme Government about the Cambay administration under this Diwán. On the authority of the report submitted by a responsible officer it has been asserted by the Government of India that, under the administration of Mr. Laud, oppressive taxes were imposed upon the rayats and oppression and torture were practised, and yet it remarks that Mr. Laud was a well-meaning but injudicious administrator, and that the Cambay rayats wrongly entertained a dislike for him. It is surprising that no steps should have been taken against Mr. Laud when the Government of India has admitted that his administration has been guilty of grave offences. It is to be hoped that legal steps will be taken by the disinterested parties who have been moving in this matter against the delinquencies of the late Diwán. The Nawáb having failed to show due ability to administer his State properly, he has been rightly served by Government by excluding him from all interference in the administration for a period of two years. [The Jáme Jamshed (84), in its issue of the 21st May, expresses some of the above sentiments.]

32. In noticing the same subject, the Gujarát Darpan (80), in its issue of the 21st May, writes:—It is now for the public to judge who should be held criminally responsible for the events which culminated in the Cambay slaughter. It is impossible to disguise the fact that the Nawáb must be held responsible for the collapse of his administration; and we feel that, were it not for the Kashmere debate in Parliament, Cambay would ere long have had the red colour extended to it. It is more our concern here, however, to give some compensation to the widows and orphans of those who have fallen victims to this disgraceful mal-administration, and to judge who should pay the piper for the same, whether the Nawáb or the Diwán. With His Excellency Lord Harris's acknowledgment in his kharita of injustice and oppression on the part of the Nawáb, his minister and his subordinates, we believe the rayat's case is fully made out that they were suffering from a grave provocation, and that the Nawáb nominally, but the Diwán principally, should be taken to task for the sad massacre. We have always respected authority and law, and we know that even a grave provocation could not justify an unlawful assembly for obtaining redress or reforms; but this we do say that the Cambay affair is very peculiar, being in the main, as Mr. Lee-Warner calls it, an agrarian disturbance, the cause of it being a widespread alarm that, after reliance upon the promises made by the Nawáb in 1881, the survey operations would bring no application of a British settlement, but only an increase to burdens already intolerable. Mr. James has the honesty to say "that the rayats do not seem to have been urged on by intrigue. It is a general movement of dissatisfaction and for redress of grievances which undoubtedly exist. To these grievances and the fact that the previous demonstration had been successful, to general mismanagement of the State and particularly to the grave weakness and incapacity shown by the Nawáb, the Diwán and their subordinates when the movement began to gain a head, I attribute the recent lamentable events." We can see no stronger justification than the above for popular resentment, and must hold the Darbár, and especially Mr. Shámráo, the Diwán, responsible for the massacre of 1890.

Re-employment of several dismissed servants in the Cambay State disapproved.

33. The Svadesh Bandhu (126), in its issue of the 20th May, expresses dissatisfaction at the re-employment in the Cambay State of several persons who were employed under Mr. S. N. Laud, the late Diwán, but were subsequently dismissed by the present Administrator.

Visit of Colonel Hancock, Acting Political Agent, Káthiáwár, and Mr. Cooke, Acting Political Agent, Cambay, to the Shatrunja Hill, in the Káthiáwár Agency, and the insult alleged to have been given to the Jains by these officers.

34. The Ahmedabad Times (89), in its issue of the 20th May, observes:—On 20th March last Colonel Hancock, Acting Political Agent, Káthiáwár, and Mr. Cooke, Acting Political Agent, Cambay, visited in company of a European lady the Shatrunja Hill, in the Pálitána State in Káthiáwár. When the party appeared at the gate called Angárasápir they were asked, in accordance with a board put up there, by the person in charge of the hill to take off their boots and put on kinkháb shoes, but they refused to comply with the request. Before entering the Chomukhji's temple Mr. Cooke put on the kinkháb shoes over his leather boots and took his dogs with him in the front portion of the temple, thereby wounding the feelings of the Jains who were present on the spot. The managers of these temples have called for an explanation from Colonel Hancock. We refrain at present from making any comments on the subject, but, in the meantime, request the Jain community to send a memorial to Government on the subject, and request it to take due notice of the improper conduct of these officers.

Praise of the land revenue system in the Baroda State.

35. The Hitechchhu (83) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 21st May, in praising the Gáikwád's administration, observes that the land tax in the Baroda State is so reasonable that several British cultivators have migrated to the Gáikwád's territory, evidently in preference to paying high land assessment in British territories.

Appearance of a highwayman near the town of Kathor in the Baroda State.

36. A correspondent of the Gujarát Mitra (82), in its issue of the 17th May, says that a highwayman with a small gang has been going about plundering in the neighbourhood of the town of Kathor in the Baroda State, and requests the Baroda authorities to bring him to book.

Alleged mismanagement in the Jámnagar State.

37. The Praja Mat (115), in its issue of the 16th May, observes :—Jánbái and Mr. Karsan Khavás, the latter of whom has been ordered to be dismissed from His Highness the Jám's service for some revenue defalcations, have succeeded in prejudicing the Jám against Mr. Rághav Khavás and several subjects of the State. Mr. Rághav Khavás was very popular in Jámnagar and his dismissal has caused widespread regret. The property of two Banias has been confiscated, while the houses of several other Banias have been attached by the State. We request the Government of His Excellency Lord Harris to enquire into these intrigues and obtain justice to the aggrieved parties. [The Hindusthán (105) in its issue of the 17th May, expresses similar sentiments.]

Alleged intrigues in the Jámnagar State.

38. The Nyáyadarshak (113), in its issue of the 18th May, observes :—The intrigues going on in the Jámnagar State have, it is stated, originated with Mr. Karsan Khavás, who is said to have amassed a fortune of nearly 30 lákhs of rupees. He is backed by Mr. Maganlál Bápubhái, the Diwán. Our Jámnagar correspondent, however, states that Jánbái is also intriguing and has obtained the dismissal of Mr. Rághav Khavás by representing to the Jám that he is the adviser of Prince Kálubha. We fear the State is likely to be mismanaged by such intrigues under the administration of the weak-minded Diwán, Mr. Maganlál, and desire the removal of Jánbái, Mr. Karsan Khavás, their accomplices, and the Diwán. [The Ahmedabad Times (89), in its issue of the 20th May, expresses similar sentiments.]

A few remarks on Colonel W. Scott, late Political Agent Mahi Kántha.

39. In alluding to the recent transfer of Colonel W. Scott, Political Agent, Mahi Kántha, to Pálanpur, a correspondent of the Hitechchhu (83) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 21st May, observes that while that officer was in charge of the Mahi Kántha Agency for the last six years he was found to be very obstinate, and that when he once commenced to trust a subordinate he would fully rely on him, even entrusting to him such important matter as making appointments. The correspondent also complains that Colonel Scott had an inveterate prejudice against natives of Mahi Kántha and always took care to fill up vacancies with outsiders.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ā) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Part I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

The policy of Divide et impera alleged to have been followed by the British in India condemned.

1. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 24th May, writes:—The riot at Calcutta ought to open the eyes of the authorities. For some time past, a class of short-sighted politicians have discovered that the difficulties of Government are considerably lightened by setting class against class. It is the famous old rule of Divide et impera. It is a new departure in Indian politics, as far as we know. Formerly, the different communities were treated alike by the rulers. There was no favoured class. Perhaps, since then, in various directions improved methods of government have been introduced. Honest endeavours have been made to bring to light acts of high-handedness. In other ways, too, the administration is rendered purer. But alongside these advantages an evil has crept in of late years. It is the one we have mentioned above. "Divide and rule" has been accepted by some as a useful rule of government, and it has been acted on. In the history of governments, there is a stage during which "Divide and rule" may not only facilitate work, but may be necessary and expedient as a principle of practical politics. Whatever be the circumstances under which such a rule of politics may be unobjectionable, we can easily hazard the declaration that it is entirely unsuited to the condition of India, at least to her present condition. A Governor-General, who came to these shores some twenty years ago, perceived how the Mahomedans had been falling backwards. They formed, and form, no unimportant element in the Indian population under the British rule. It was marked that the ways and means of civilization which were opened to the other communities had not been seized by this race and made use of for its advancement pari passu with the other races inhabiting the continent. When attention was once directed to the matter, it was taken up by subsequent rulers. It was true statesmanlike policy, therefore, that the rulers were pursuing when they bestirred themselves to advance the backward Mahomedans, to throw facilities in the way of their education—to bring it nearer to them, as it were, in order to meet them half-way—to encourage all their efforts for their improvement. Some district officers and others, however, who could give away places and bestow honours and favours, therefore began to patronize the class, but without making the necessary difference between merit and no merit. They took the Mahomedans under their care in such a manner as to increase race jealousies between the Mahomedans and other communities. They showed as little discretion in siding with them. Their behaviour gave the Mahomedans, the uneducated or half-educated among them especially, to understand that the Government feared them more than other races, that it wished to conciliate them and humour them, if necessary, that it would think twice before it came to a rupture with them. In return for the favours that were bestowed, sometimes imprudently, on individual Mahomedans, they were required to have no sympathy with the political or quasi-political agitations, with Congress meetings, &c., which the other races were engaged in. A not very honourable attempt was made to buy them off. It is not only in connection with political movements that Government servants have served by their imprudent behaviour to create difficulties for the future. In the bestowal of posts and honours, and in other modes of dealing with them, their conduct has not been such as to leave an impression behind that they were always guided by a sense of justice. The impression left behind rather was that the Government favoured a particular class. The class itself and other classes believed it. In the class in which ignorance and religious fanaticism in the lower strata are the prevailing vices, this was a dangerous opinion to inculcate. The overwise Government officials, in following their mischievous policy, have been congratulating themselves that they have been pursuing the right means of establishing firmly their sway over the heterogeneous mass of the Indian population. It is now time for them to watch carefully the results. It would be hasty to declare that the Calcutta riots are to be traced to the objectionable policy lately adopted by certain officials. Anyhow, the opinion prevails to a certain extent that the British authorities do not always show the same regard to the Hindu places of worship that they show to Mahomedan tombs, &c. The rule for their guidance on such a ticklish subject should be very simple. The rule should be based on what is considered in civilised communities a necessary concession to other peoples' religious susceptibilities. Not that private rights should be over-ridden; but in no case should any community get more than another, under similar circumstances, would. Good sense, justice and a fair spirit of compromise, wherever possible, should appear in all transactions of this class. The mild Hindu is entitled to as much consideration in such matters as the Mahomedan. It would be extremely impolitic to yield more to the latter because he is apt to take offence and show fight unnecessarily, much more than the other. The hazardous consequences of such a treatment cannot but recoil on the rulers some time or other. It may not be out of place to point out that what we have here called the right policy for the Government to pursue is as much in the interest of the Mahomedan community itself as of any other. Indeed, we go so far as to entertain the belief that the present policy of favouritism rather injures the best interests of the race and tends to retard its progress. The favourites of kings are an unfortunate class. They do not live on a nourishing diet. There is no genuine sound improvement without the necessary expenditure of energy and effort. That alone enables a race to support itself under difficulties, and hold its own in the competition of rival communities.

Remarks in connection with Afghan politics.

2. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 24th May, writes:—The Afghan politics have assumed a new phase. From a subsidy-holder, the Amir is to be launched into a permanent debtor, in order that he may give his subjects the benefits of Western civilization. But who is to be the creditor is not known. From what the Bombay Gazette says, it appears that the Indian treasury will be tapped for the required resources, and in return the Indian tax-payer will get his interest on the sums advanced. Indeed, the scheme has a very attractive appearance, but this new development of Indian diplomacy must convert the Amir into a more bitter enemy of ours and make him rush into the arms of Russia. Is our Government then prepared to risk such a contingency? we ask. If we remember aright the remark made by an Afghan officer, when invited to view the Khojak tunnel, we think the Amir will be the last individual to take in the bait of this new idea. Naturally the Afghan is averse to the presence of foreigners in his country, and the construction of a railway and its connection with Herat on one side and with Quetta on the other, he cannot but look upon with suspicion. Our Government may have great influence with the Amir and he may feel induced to listen to this advice, but we doubt this new idea of civilizing Afghanistan will ever make him a greater friend of ours. Any advance of precious money for the completion of these schemes will, therefore, in the end profit none. We admit that a through railway to Herat will give our Government a command of the Northern borders of Afghanistan; but in view of our other increasing difficulties, is such a course advisable? But, this question of self-preservation apart, will the new lines be an advantage commercially, either to the Amir or to ourselves? The utmost that these lines may do is that our own and British traders will have a simultaneous access to Afghan territories, but we do not think Russia will ever allow Indian or Afghan goods to enter her territory unless heavy protective duties are paid. Is such an attitude worth courting at India's expense? we ask. Indeed, in the absence of the Suez Canal, the Quetta, Herat and Moscow route might bring European markets nearer to us, but when those markets are already open, and may be reached earlier, where is the necessity of the proposed route, except on the ground of further opening up Afghanistan? We are afraid the Amir is being too freely pampered at our own expense. Has not our Government a very wide scope for the investment of its resources? Has not the Indian tax-payer a right to the use of the money he supplies for his own advancement? These new lines may throw fresh life into the British iron trade, but why may not our Government establish iron factories of its own and turn out its own steel rails and machines, and thus have the credit of being the fresh pioneers of a new industry in the country? But we are sure the principle of free trade will here come in and the Government will do nothing of the kind. To us the scheme appears to be a waste, and Government ought not to be generous in this matter when it has other crying Indian wants to attend to.

3. The Rást Goftár (86), in its issue of the 24th May, says :—Mr. Schwann, M.P., is taken to task by irate Anglo-Indians for speaking his mind about the relations between Europeans and Natives in India. Mr. Schwann's heart is in the right place, and his wish that Anglo-Indians should behave better towards Natives is creditable to him. This commendable desire on his part has, however, led him to believe a thing or two which, it is to be wished, he had not published on mere hearsay, as he appears to have done. He wrote in the Star, after his return from India, that Anglo-Indian ladies can never talk of the execution of a Native without saying that "another nigger has been polished off." There are things which are too good to be true. This is too bad to be true. It is impossible to conceive that English ladies, when they happen to be in India, are so lost to all sense of humanity and refinement as to speak of the Natives who are hanged, as niggers polished off. It is impossible to conceive that they would be capable of uttering words so vulgar and brutal of a dead man, whatever be the circumstances of his end. English tourists, full of honest sympathy for the people of India, ought to guard against believing all that they hear as well as against making hasty generalizations from particular instances. However, Mr. Schwann's complaint about the general attitude of Englishmen towards Natives is not so groundless as the correspondents of the St. James' Gazette would have the English public believe. There are too many instances of Anglo-Indians who are insolent and overbearing in their demeanour towards Natives, and their example is imitated in an aggravated form by their half-brothers, Eurasians and East Indians. They belong, no doubt, to a superior race, which is also the ruling race. The proud consciousness of superiority and power, coupled with a natural absence of sympathy with the subject races, makes them forget at times their native fairness and courtesy. Hence the marked difference which is said to exist between Englishmen on this side of Suez and those on the other side. The correspondents and the editor of the St. James' Gazette endeavour to explain away instances given by Mr. Schwann, illustrating the demeanour of Englishmen towards Natives, but the explanations seem to be very unsatisfactory. We must not be understood to pronounce a general condemnation against all Anglo-Indians, or even against a majority of them. Several Anglo-Indians have caught in various degrees the influences of their position and their surroundings, but among all these are ever glorious instances of minds that have been able to withstand these influences and to present to those around them excellent examples of fairness, generosity and high-mindedness.

4. The Mahratta (4), in its issue of the 24th May, writes:—Before the prosecutions in connection with the Benares riot have closed, another riot, and in every way a more serious one, has taken place in Calcutta. The riot owed its origin to religious enthusiasm. Now, no one can help regretting that the religious susceptibilities of such irritable people as the Mahomedans should have been touched; but at the same time the owner of the land could hardly have foreseen that the Mahomedans would make a grievance out of it. Under ordinary circumstances the matter would, we believe, have not assumed such a serious aspect. But the recent piece of legislation of the Government has certainly disturbed the minds of the people, rudely awakened their suspicion about the sincerity of the Government profession of religious neutrality and the avowed policy of non-interference with religious practices. The decision of the Courts was, probably, viewed in this light by the infuriated Mahomedans, who very likely believed this was another covert attack on their religion. They were wrong, no doubt. But their excitement was natural. We do not know how many more such scenes would be required to teach the Government the absolute necessity of strictly observing its promises, solemnly given on a solemn occasion. We know the supporters of the Government measure will try to make capital out of the riot. We shall be treated to serious warnings about gagging the Native press and confiscating the right of public meeting. Such advice will be gratuitously and persistently pressed upon the Government. In fact, every attempt will be made to obscure the real significance and moral of the incident. [The Satyavakta (119), in its issue of the 29th May, expresses similar sentiments.]

Mr. Schwann, M. P., on the relations between Europeans and Natives in India.

4. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 24th May, writes:—Before the prosecutions in connection with the Benares riot have closed, another riot, and in every way a more serious one, has taken place in Calcutta. The riot owed its origin to religious enthusiasm. Now, no one can help regretting that the religious susceptibilities of such irritable people as the Mahomedans should have been touched; but at the same time the owner of the land could hardly have foreseen that the Mahomedans would make a grievance out of it. Under ordinary circumstances the matter would, we believe, have not assumed such a serious aspect. But the recent piece of legislation of the Government has certainly disturbed the minds of the people, rudely awakened their suspicion about the sincerity of the Government profession of religious neutrality and the avowed policy of non-interference with religious practices. The decision of the Courts was, probably, viewed in this light by the infuriated Mahomedans, who very likely believed this was another covert attack on their religion. They were wrong, no doubt. But their excitement was natural. We do not know how many more such scenes would be required to teach the Government the absolute necessity of strictly observing its promises, solemnly given on a solemn occasion. We know the supporters of the Government measure will try to make capital out of the riot. We shall be treated to serious warnings about gagging the Native press and confiscating the right of public meeting. Such advice will be gratuitously and persistently pressed upon the Government. In fact, every attempt will be made to obscure the real significance and moral of the incident. [The Satyavakta (119), in its issue of the 29th May, expresses similar sentiments.]

Alleged causes of the Calcutta riot.

5. The Poona Vaibhav (53), in its issue of the 24th May, refers to the recent Benares and Calcutta riots, considers them as the result of the discontent caused by the oppression practised on the rayats, and requests Government to be careful not to offend the religious susceptibilities of the people, such a course being safer than relying on their own strength to quell such disturbances.

Remarks on the sentences passed upon some of the accused in the recent Benares riots.

6. The Mahratta (4), in its issue of the 24th May, writes:—When one reads the sentences meted out to those convicted of being concerned in the Benares riots, one's hair stands on end, however earnest his desire may be that an example should be made of such people. Here is a list of the eight who were punished in the telegraph office case:—

Sheik Kullu	...	...	... 14	years.
Damodar	...	...	... 14	„
Parbhu	...	...	... 14	„
Nirottum	...	...	... 12	„
Purashottum	...	...	... 12	„
Kassim	....	...	... 10	„
Gopi	...	...	... 10	„
Pabhu	...	...	... 7	„

The last three are declared to be mere boys. This is, we venture to say, justice with a vengeance. In England, riots very often take place, but we never hear of such heavy punishment. Here, again, look at the provocation. The poor fellows believed that the temple of a beloved deity was going to be destroyed. Their religious sense was wounded. They acted under excited feelings. We wonder how Judges could be so cruel in India! [The Arunodaya (19), in its issue of the 24th May, expresses similar sentiments.]

Enhancement of the land revenue assessment in the Central Provinces.

7. The Mahratta (4), in its issue of the 24th May, says:—The subject of the enhancement of the assessment in connection with the new settlement in the Central Provinces was recently touched in a question in the House of Commons. From the articles on the subject that have appeared in the Nyáyá Sudha of Harda we find that there is good ground to complain that the enhancements are very heavy. Our contemporary gives a list prepared from a list placed at its disposal showing how "the interests of the landholding classes have been safeguarded by that most dutiful servant of Government, Rái Bahádur Purushottam Dás." From this list we select a few cases:—

Name of the village.	Land revenue under the old settlement.	Land revenue under the new settlement.
	Rs.	Rs.
Pendri	73	280
Tehka	70	285
Akaltora	30	385
Madra	25	150
Sonbarsa	30	200
Ortara	100	460
Surkhi	20	320
Onti	30	260
Hasda	40	320
Muldi	100	450
Devarani	25	280
Tikari	50	265
Chamari	60	290
Koni	50	285
Kosumda	50	365
Mopka	150	360

These are taken from a list containing 59 names. Let our readers read and wonder. In some cases the increase is sixteen times the original assessment. In India the State is a monopolist in regard to land, and this is why it abuses that position. And yet British officers with philanthropic tendencies complain of the rack-renting of the Zamindárs and of the exactions of the Khots!

Difference in social matters among Hindus does not interfere with political questions.

8. The Din Bandhu (9), in its issue of the 24th May, writes:—It is a very gratifying sign of the times that our educated countrymen have begun to understand the difference between private bickerings and public duties, and have after forgetting their differences of opinion jointly worked together for the promotion of the welfare of their country. Whether Sudháraks or Garbhádhánists, they have certain duties to discharge towards their country, and that they can meet on a common platform we are glad they have practically shown at the recent Provincial Conference by carrying on their deliberations in a calm and dispassionate manner. Amongst the resolutions of the Conference we specially approve of the last one which authorises the President to memorialize Government on certain subjects—a step which will bring the Conference in touch with Government and give the delegates an opportunity of ascertaining the policy and the wishes of Government in regard to matters complained of. We think the Conference was, however, ill-advised in bringing forward the resolution about the Age of Consent Act. A Conference like this ought to avoid sectional and debatable subjects like the Consent Act, and should take up such questions for deliberation and for representation to Government as are unanimously considered to be more pressing and demanding immediate redress. Perhaps, it is a consolation, though we consider it to be a very poor one, to some of the delegates of the Garbhádhánist party that they have after all succeeded in getting the Conference to adopt the resolution.

Approval of the grant of a pension to Mr. A. T. Crawford.

9. The Karnátak Patrá (133), in its issue of the 25th May, observes:—Some time ago we predicted in these columns that Mr. Crawford was sure to screw out a pension from the Secretary of State for India. Our prediction has now come to pass. Mr. Crawford has been granted a pension of £150 annually, in addition to the pensions already granted to his wife and daughter. We are glad that poor Mr. Crawford, who was a staunch friend of our countrymen and who would have figured as the wisest of men in the position of Vazir to Prince Akbar or Aurangzeb, though a little naughty in his conduct behind the curtain, is, after all, made, rightly or wrongly, tolerably comfortable in his old age. Merit must always have its own reward. Mr. Crawford's reward, however, has not been adequate to his merit, and hence we may anticipate that he will not rest satisfied here. [The Samsher Bahádur (117), in its issue of the 22nd May, expresses similar sentiments.]

Disapproval of the pension granted to Mr. A. T. Crawford.

10. The Gujaráti (81), in its issue of the 24th May, writes:—Mr. Crawford's friends have at last succeeded in obtaining for him an allowance of one hundred and fifty pounds per annum. Everyone in India had grown sick of the dishonest and disgraceful agitation that had been started on his behalf from the beginning both here and in England, and it is to be hoped the public will now be spared further agitation for reimbursing Mr. Crawford's legal expenses. The Crawford case has shown the most humiliating side of the English administration in India, and the Anglo-Indian writers who often indulge in tall talk about their lofty morality will, it may be hoped, begin to take a more sober view of the foibles in the character of other people. There has hardly occurred a case which has more lowered English administration in India in the estimation of the public than the Crawford scandal and the most shameful agitation that was conducted on his behalf. A high officer who was for years notorious for his irregularities is systematically fondled by Government. A righteous Governor like Lord Reay makes up his mind to put a stop to the scandal. He is hampered in this righteous work by some of his own countrymen and is even vilified by them in a most unscrupulous fashion. The poor Mámlatdárs who were the victims of Mr. Crawford's extortion readily stood by Government by coming forward as witnesses before the Crawford Commission on the strength of the plighted word of Her Majesty's representative in this presidency. The promise is more or less broken and they are sent about their business. Mr. Crawford is acquitted and an allowance granted to his wife and daughter. The arch-offender stealthily leaves Bombay without paying a farthing to his numerous creditors. After some time an agitation is again commenced in England by some of his friends, who in endeavouring to vindicate his innocence fall foul of Lord Reay. The India Council, which drains away lákhs of rupees from India without any adequate return for the money that is spent upon its unwieldy establishment, yields to their importunities, and the poor rayat, who is denied the privilege of using even sufficient salt, is mulcted in a sum of £150 per annum, simply because a dismissed servant of Government who has successfully imposed upon his creditors to the tune of nearly a lákh and a half of rupees has powerful friends in England to make their influence felt in the Council of the Secretary of State for India. It is impossible to conceive anything more scandalous than the racial bias of the most degrading kind that has played such an important part in this Crawford drama. He as well as his friends are at liberty to congratulate themselves on their success; but the fact remains that the disclosures made in the Crawford case and its shameful termination have cast a stigma on British rule in India which it will take a century to efface. It is true that the public opinion in India is not so strong as to make itself irresistibly felt in the Councils of the State. But there is hardly a single intelligent Native who has not begun to perceive by this time that, after all, blood is thicker than water and all professions of superior morality are nothing but magnificent shams, when the interests of the ruling class are in danger. [The Satyavakta (119) of the 22nd May and the Suryá Prakásh (88) of the 23rd also express their disapproval of the grant of the pension.]

The Bombay Graduates' Association and Mr. Nugent.

11. The Rást Goftár (86), in its issue of the 24th May, writes:—The Bombay Graduates' Association has given Mr. John Nugent his due by passing a resolution, recording their cordial acknowledgment of his encouragement to higher education by employing graduates in the Secretariat. The occasion for the resolution is the transfer of Mr. Nugent from the Secretariat to the Commissionership of a Division. Mr. Nugent is known as an upright and able official, with sympathies broader than what can usually be found within the charmed circle of the hierarchy to which he belongs. Besides being a practical recognition of higher education, his employment of University men must result in raising the efficiency of the public service.

12. In alluding to the praises bestowed by the Jáme Jamshed on Mr. J. Nugent, late Chief Secretary to the Government of Bombay, the Satyavakta (119), in its issue of the 29th May, asks if the Maráthas employed in the Secretariat were idle and unfit for their work and Mr. Nugent found the Pársis only as fit to be patronized. The paper observes that the list of the Pársis employed by Mr. Nugent given in the Jáme shows that Mr. Nugent found the Pársis only deserving of being appointed to high posts in the Secretariat; but in praising such an officer, the Graduates' Association and the Jáme have lowered him in public estimation and encouraged him to continue to show partiality to one community. The Satyavakta hopes that the Jáme will be good enough to give a list of the Gujaráti and Maráthi Hindus and Mahomedans employed by Mr. Nugent, in order to prove his impartiality.

13. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 28th May, writes:—While the ink of the resolution that now allows one shilling and nine pence a rupee to every European officer is hardly dry, a cry is sent forth about a block in the Bombay Civil Service, suggesting the forced retirement of the so-called blockers and lifts to those who may complain of a blight of their prospects. This time the cry is raised by no less a person than Dr. Pollen, and, in protesting against the apathy of the Secretary of State in this matter, he represents his present lot in the service as a great misfortune. Of course, Dr. Pollen is a man of parts, and finding his merits go unrewarded he ventilates his grievance. But were Dr. Pollen to take a wider view of the matter and see for himself how the services in other parts of the British Empire stand in the matter of pay, all the grounds of his grievance would be smashed at once. However, those who organised the Indian heaven-born services have been over-kind in fixing the rates of pay, and it is but natural that those whom they refer must protest whenever an opportunity occurs. High rates may have been necessary some fifty years ago, but the circumstances of the country have since then changed, and with this change a revision of the rules of the Civil Service covenant has become a growing necessity. If members of the Civil Service are really wronged, we have no right to find fault with them for a ventilation of their real grievances; but, at the same time, the Secretary of State is not called upon to be over-zealous in showing undue compunction in this matter. There are one or two more points which we cannot pass by without some comment. This complaint of the block has not been the first of its kind; it recurs at every favourable disposition of Government temperament, and the grievance is recompensed in proportion to its vociferousness One has not to go far to seek the cause of the alleged block. The Secretary of State sends out every year more civil service recruits than may be actually wanted, and the result is a block in the service. This point has been raised several times, and the India Office cannot plead guilty of ignorance. Put off annual recruitment for some time, and there will be no complaint about block. Another point worth adverting to is a growing indisposition among Civil Servants to remain longer in the service. If men could be found in England to work in the different departments at the advanced age of seventy-five or eighty, we cannot see why Indian Civil Servants may not be able to remain in harness for a longer period than they do now. To achieve this the covenant must be so revised as to admit of the change. This is quite possible; but as the India Office is principally manned by members of the same service, we need expect no healthy change from them, unless Parliament interferes and enforces the requisite revision. Will some member of Parliament who feels a living interest in India acquaint himself with this matter and achieve a change, which will not only place due limitations on the ambition of the Civil Service, but will accord considerable pecuniary relief. We hope our public bodies will take up the question and place it in its proper colour before the authorities.

Rumoured appointment of a briefless European barrister as a Presidency Magistrate in Bombay strongly disapproved.

14. The Gujarátí (81), in its issue of the 24th May, writes:—It is widely rumoured that a briefless barrister, who has never distinguished himself in any capacity, is to be appointed to succeed Mr. Cooper, who will soon retire from the bench. If there is any truth in this report, it is time that the public of Bombay should take measures to let their views known to Government. Despite the abuses that were showered upon Lord Reay by interested persons, that honest and just Governor firmly declined to be a party to a scandalous job, and we hardly think that if His Excellency Lord Harris, who has won for himself the reputation of being straightforward, could be put in possession of all the facts, His Lordship would sanction an appointment that is sure to rouse public indignation. Quite recently a humdrum mediocrity, whose career in the Educational Department can scarcely be called a success, was removed to another sphere of duty carrying a salary of more than a thousand rupees, and we do not think it would in any sense enhance the reputation of our Government for impartiality, if they sanctioned an appointment which is sure to be condemned on all hands. It may be that certain persons have friends influential and powerful enough to obtain for them fat berths; but that is surely no reason why the public interests should suffer. The proposed nomination to the magisterial bench is not only not satisfactory in itself, but is open to the objection that it would be a grave injustice to competent Native lawyers. In Calcutta there is a Native Presidency Magistrate, and in Bombay we had one till the retirement of Mr. Dosábhái Frámji, and it would be a scandal if in a city like ours, which has been deservedly called urbs prima in Indis, no Native gentleman could be found able to discharge the duties of a Presidency Magistrate. It is also rumoured that the briefless barrister whose friends are doing their best for him, will not be at once pitchforked into the chair of the Chief Presidency Magistrate, but that he will at first be appointed Third or Second Magistrate, and that after a short incumbency elevated to the dignity of the First Magistrateship. This is, of course, a transparent device, and the public are shrewd enough to understand the meaning of such shifts. We have, however, sufficient faith in the Government of Lord Harris and his judicial adviser, upon whom will mainly rest the responsibility of the new appointment, and no one is prepared to believe that the responsible adviser of a new Governor, who is himself an eminent jurist of widely acknowledged attainments, will accord his approval to a nomination that is sure to evoke a protest from the public. But if the unexpected does happen, the citizens of this city must be prepared to do their duty by forwarding a strong protest to the Secretary of State. We hope such an unpleasant contingency will not arise. But Government not seldom treats public opinion with supreme contempt, and backstairs influence is proverbially irresistible. We have, therefore, thought it proper to sound a warning note in time, and we hope public sentiment will make itself felt before it is too late. [The Subodh Patrika (16), in its issue of the 24th May, expresses similar sentiments.]

Regret expressed at the post of Third Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, not being conferred upon a Native.

15. The Jáme Jamshed (84), in its issue of the 29th May, says:—It is to be much regretted that the vacancy that has occurred by the transfer of Mr. C. W. Richardson, the acting Third Presidency Magistrate, has been filled up by the appointment of Mr. W. Webb, when a Native ought to have got the place. Up to three years ago there were two Native Magistrates in Bombay for a long number of years, and they discharged their duties to the satisfaction of Government and the public. There was, therefore, no reason to take away the two appointments from the Natives, particularly when there are two Native Presidency Magistrates both at Calcutta and Madras and orders from the Secretary of State for India exist to the effect that a post of more salary than two hundred rupees per month should not be conferred upon a European without obtaining his sanction.

The Arms Act and the Bombay East Indian community.

16. The Bombay East Indian (1), in its issue of the 27th May, writes:—We were not a little surprised to read in last Friday's Bombay Gazette a telegram from its Simla correspondent to the effect that, the Government of India have, on a reference from the local Government, ruled that the Bombay East Indians do not come under the definition of "East Indian" as contemplated in the Arms Act, and are not, therefore, entitled to the exemption accorded to East Indians in the Act. We were surprised, not at the interpretation given by the Government of India to the term "East Indian" occurring in the Arms Act, for regarding that we had no doubt; but that any occasion should have been given to the Government of India to interpret the term in this relation. It seems that some private individuals had memorialised the Government of India on the subject, as we are informed by the Secretary of the Bombay East Indian Association that no representation with regard to the Arms Act was sent by the Association either to this Government or the Government of India. The action of the memorialists in appealing to the Government of India without availing themselves of the corporate wisdom of the community, as embodied in its representative Association, might well be questioned, but, on the other hand, it is satisfactory to note that the memorialists have indirectly cleared the way towards a better recognition of the term "Bombay East Indian" as the designation of our community. We are well aware—and we know that the Bombay East Indian Association takes the same view—that the term "East Indian" used by the Government of India in their notification of March 1879, exempting certain classes of people from the operation of the Arms Act, is applicable to Eurasians only. The term "East Indian" has since almost entirely ceased to be applied to persons of mixed descent, and the term "Eurasian" substituted in its place apparently because the former term is not a suitable designation for them. We have all along contended that by calling ourselves "Bombay East Indians" we have not rendered ourselves liable to be misunderstood for Eurasians, and the recent ruling of the Government of India furnishes a strong justification for our contention, which we commend to the attention of the microscopic minority amongst us who object to the designation "Bombay East Indian" on the score of its confounding us in the eyes of the public and the powers that be, with the Eurasians. The Government of India know now at least who the Bombay East Indians are, and there will no longer be any danger, if any did at all ever exist, of their confounding us with the Eurasians.

With regard to our position under the Arms Act, we are still of opinion that we should, at an opportune time, make a representation to the Government of India for special exemption from the operations of the Act, not because we consider ourselves to be East Indians in the sense of Eurasians. Our military services, which are too well known to be specified, will be a strong argument for our being freed from the restrictions of the Act. No less weighty arguments will be the circumstance of all our interests being bound up with the maintenance of British supremacy in India and the facts that in our religion we have sympathies in common with our British rulers, and that in our education, manners, dress and language we are largely Europeanized. We must, however, confess that the question of our exemption as a class is not yet within the range of practical politics.

17. In alluding to the ruling of the Government of India, that the Bombay East Indians do not come under the definition of "East Indian" as contemplated in the Arms Act and are not therefore entitled to the exemption accorded to East Indians in the Act, the Jáme Jamshed (84), in its issue of the 25th May, says:—It is not right that Government should estimate the loyalty of its Native subjects according to their races. It is wrong to assume that Europeans and Eurasians only are loyal to Government, while the loyalty of Natives and Native Christians is doubtful, because neither French, nor Germans, nor Russians can ever have so much interest in the permanency of British rule in India as the natives of India have, and a suspicion of the loyalty of the latter is an unjustifiable discouragement to them. If the Bombay East Indians cannot carry arms without a license, how can any of them remain in the Bombay Volunteer Corps, which is said to contain several of them?

Government officers in Gujarát are alleged to pay small prices for provisions purchased by them.

18. The Praja Mat (115), in its issue of the 23rd May, observes:—In Gujarát, when Government officers go on tour, they pay only nominal prices for the articles they purchase, taking receipts for full payments. On inquiry, Government will find that the number of such fabricated receipts is very large, and if any of the traders makes himself bold to complain to a Collector or some other officer he is unnecessarily detained in custody for a time. A well-paid detective officer for each district is needed to bring such spurious transactions to light.

The Rájábái Tower tragedy and the Bombay Police.

19. While writing about the death on the 25th April last of two Pársi women by a fall from the Rájábái Tower at Bombay and the evidence brought by the police at the inquest that is being held by the Coroner regarding the cause of the fall, the Jáme Jamshed (84), in its issue of the 29th May, writes:—Mr. McDermott, Superintendent of Police, when he first saw the bodies of the two unfortunate Pársi girls who had fallen from the Rájábái Tower and requested the doctors on the spot to examine them with a view to discover if there were any marks of violence on them, was reported to be of opinion that there had been foul play, and that of a murderous character. That opinion was strengthened and confirmed when a peon, who apparently knows a great deal more about the case than he chooses to disclose, made a statement to him on Sunday the 26th April, i.e., the day after the tragedy. It is said that a most important statement was then made to the police, but why the clue disclosed by the statement was not followed up or why it has not been published has never been explained. The subsequent statement laid before the Coroner and the jury is said to be as unlike the first as any two statements can possibly be in the most important particulars. Within a few hours of this conviction, however, it seems to have been found convenient to start the theory of suicide, which was tenaciously clung to until it was impossible with any decency to maintain it any longer. A jump was then made to the theory of accident, and since that time all the efforts and resources of those concerned seem to have been directed to support such theory by evidence, ordinary and expert, which, however, can scarcely bear examination and which, moreover, stands out in significant contrast with the plain and forcible evidence of the peon Arjun Ráma and of the Pársi children, which has remained absolutely unshaken under the most searching cross-examination and throws a flood of light on the murders. So clear and cogent has this evidence been, and so truthful on the face of it, that it has extorted an admission of their convincing nature and importance even from the most obstinate champions of the accident theory. At present we feel constrained to raise our voice once again against the indefensible proceedings of the professed guardians of public safety and its apologists. It seems that the police showed a degree of remissness and indifference to their duty in not following up the clue of the parcel of clothes to which its attention was earnestly drawn at a very early stage of the case. Apart from the truth or falsehood of the story as stated to Mr. J. B. Marzban and by him communicated to the police, it is impossible not to feel indignant at the police having gone to sleep over the matter for fully 60 hours after the news had been communicated to it and then naively proclaiming that it was all a hoax. The police has simply failed to employ its detective skill and resources to discover any evidence, worthy of the name, in such an important case. Nowhere else in the civilized world would such absolutely indefensible proceedings be tolerated. We should like to know what steps the police has taken to discover the whereabouts of the Mahomedan servant who has most conveniently disappeared, but who is believed to be in a position to furnish the most important evidence in regard to the parcel of clothes. Why, again, has it not taken any trouble to discover and produce the clerk of Asláji's solicitors who suddenly left for Sávantvádi under circumstances open to grave suspicion? What has become of the owner of the dog which is said to have caused the rent in Asláji's jacket, and who, it was said, would be forthcoming to give evidence regarding the cock-and-bull story with which the public intelligence is sought to be insulted? What is the meaning of the omission to produce the promised evidence which was to show that screams raised on the top balcony could be heard by passers-by on the main road? It is difficult to believe that the police of Bombay, with its acknowledged detective capacity and ingenuity, is unable to solve this horrid mystery. It cannot be that the University havildár A'tmárám knows nothing more than he has chosen to disclose. It may or may not be that the affectionate solicitude for the comfort and safety of that man Asláji, whose complicity in the tragedy is beyond doubt or question, is due to a mere desire to screen him from the popular fury and a virtuous desire to treat him as an innocent babe until his guilt is proved by sufficient legal evidence. It is hard to believe that the police, when it complained of the Pársi children and their evidence having been kept back from them, could have neglected the communication made to them on the subject by the editor and proprietor of the Jáme Jamshed. It is difficult to resist the conviction that from the very outset there has been remarkable bungling of some kind. The police itself has been on its trial in this case, and much as we grieve to have to say so, it is necessary to say that it has been tried and found sadly wanting. Its efforts to solve the mystery have been limited to needlessly protracting the inquiry, to the danger, probably, of tiring out and exhausting the resources of those watching the case, obscuring the main issues, bullying the witnesses, sparring with the Coroner, and placing before the jury ludicrous stories of acrobatic performances, the observation of the heels of boots from a height of 200 feet, of buttons jumping and waltzing, and the jugglery of impressing button-marks on the bare arm, of unfounded assumptions of collision with the tower and the force of the fall causing impossible injuries and unheard of rents in peculiar portions of the garments, and of the betrayal of a nervous impatience to under-estimate and minimize the force and importance of evidence calculated to break to pieces the sandy structure of the pressure of air to the square inch and the huge force of the wind, reared with such misplaced and unavailing labour and ingenuity. The feat of taking the old and tottering fakir, panting and fainting at every step, to the top of the tower and making him invisible to those about him is too ludicrous to require any notice. But what shall we say of the evidence of the Coroner's Surgeon, on whose opinion depend questions of the greatest importance, affecting the reputation and the life and liberty of the people? It is not easy to understand why this evidence, which from its nature was of the first importance and ought to have been produced at the earliest possible stage, was kept back as it was. But when the evidence did come, how disappointing it was! It consisted of merest assumptions, and, as has been pointed out by an able correspondent of the Bombay Gazette, of wild surmises and unfounded fancies in those parts where it might and ought to have been most full and positive. Dr. Smith had come apparently before the Coroner determined to account for all he had observed, and omitted to notice the theory of the fall from the tower, when the police with greater shrewdness suggested the theory of collision and the Coroner's Surgeon eagerly caught at it as the deus ex machina of the case and cried amen! The admission that similar injuries could be caused by the agency of manual force was certainly not volunteered and was almost wrung out of him by Mr. Craigie, but for whom we should probably not have heard of this possibility at all. It is not often that a Coroner's inquest excites such attention or the evidence of his Surgeon is so critically analysed, and having regard to the momentous issues involved in the case and the importance of the evidence, we trust that Dr. Smith will be called upon in fairness to himself to explain the various important points and questions of which his evidence as it stands furnishes no explanation. The case, as a whole, presents so many extraordinary features as to demand a thorough and independent investigation at the hands of Government.

20. The Kaiser-i-Hind (85), in its issue of the 24th May, writes:—None will dispute the statement that in a serious matter of this nature, wherein was involved the atrocious murder of two innocent young women of irreproachable character, under circumstances the most painful as they are mysterious, there should be no conflict of interests. In fact, the entire Pársi community, from the very hour of the horrible fatality, keenly anticipated that the police of Bombay would be able, if not at once, within a few days of the occurrence, to track the criminals and bring them to the bar of justice. And if any party anticipated such discovery of the criminals more keenly and eagerly, it was the relatives and the friends of the ill-fated ladies. Is it possible to conceive that the latter should be interested in sleeping over the matter and acting with such callous and unnatural indifference as to allow the perpetrators of that foul deed, which has made the hair of Bombay stand on end, to escape with impunity? If we concede that such a supposition is absolutely impossible, then we may reasonably inquire what on earth prevented them from assisting the police? As a matter of fact, from the very day of the fatal occurrence they were up and doing all in their power to assist that body. But then those who think like the Bombay Gazette pertinently ask, why did they choose to delay bringing forward the witnesses till full a fortnight later? We reply at once by stating as our own deep-rooted conviction, which we believe to be almost universally shared, that it was to the hostile attitude assumed by the police the second or third day after the melancholy event had occurred. It seemed as if the police were bent on beating about the bush. An adjournment of a week after the post-mortem examination was given in order to collect evidence. But it was known during the interval that nothing special was discovered, save that the notorious Asláji was suspected. But it should also be observed that during the same interval the absurd rumour, to which we referred in one of our recent issues, widely flew about all Bombay. If we connect the two together, is it irrational to build the hypothesis that possibly it was considered the part of wisdom under the circumstances to husband the testimony produced later on. At least that is our personal theory. We absolutely know nothing of the reason which may have justified Mr. Craigie to advise his clients to hold back their evidence. For in this matter we have deemed it our duty as impartial journalists to keep ourselves religiously aloof from holding any communication either with the police or the aggrieved parties. We base our criticisms on the published proceedings or on such other sources of information as are available to us. Is it impossible to conceive that an earlier disclosure might have extremely prejudiced that evidence? We cannot refrain from observing that such advice under the circumstances, if given, would not be at all unnatural. Now, is it not transparent as the noon-day sun from the tone, temper and spirit which the police has displayed towards the Solicitor while "cross-examining" the witnesses brought by that body, to make us all think that it could not be in earnest to find out the culprits? For, from the beginning it has gone on a false theory and has tried to cling to it obstinately. Within an hour of the fatal catastrophe the public voice, as if by inspiration, declared that Asláji and two Mahomedans are at the bottom of this foul deed. Surely, it did not speak without the book. How did the theory get wind? Who started it? Was it all imagination? Was it the creation of the enemy? If so, why so? Common sense here comes to our aid. It must be that some person or persons had seen these three running away immediately after the fatality. In the confusion and consternation of the moment none now can, perhaps, trace the origin of that statement. But there it is, and it has held strong grip over the public mind since then. It may be that the person or persons were afraid of the police and kept the silence of the grave. It may not be moral courage; but it may be prudence on their part to thus tie their tongue. For, it goes without saying that the police of Bombay is a terror to the masses generally, and they fly from it as they would from lepers. It is a fact that instead of being the protectors of our citizens it is looked upon as a plague. Now, we repeat that the fact of the police, in spite of the strongest public opinion, having gone to work on its own hook and ignored the more rational theory, made many suspect that body. We are free to confess we share that suspicion. Secondly, the unseemly sparring between Mr. Brewin on the one hand and the Coroner and Mr. Craigie on the other, as published, is another indication which clearly shows the hostile attitude of the police. The latter may effusively protest and cry to the heavens that in this matter it considers the interests of the aggrieved and its own to be identical. It may assert as loudly as it can that it is in search of truth. Yet what are the facts? Surely, the police cannot lay the flattering unction to its soul and boldly aver that in spite of its solicitude to discover the truth, Diogenes-like with a lantern in its hand, it has not gone in a way to mystify the murderous deed by starting first one theory, then another, and throwing confusion into the bargain. Look at Dr. Smith's examination. What was the apparent tendency of it? Was it not to discredit urbi et orbis the outrage theory? Then, Mr. Brewin asked the two clerks of the Registrar's office whether it was not their duty to have come and told him or the head of the police what the hamdl Arjun said. Why should they? What was the guarantee that had they communicated the matter, something else might have followed, perhaps, to obscure the evidence which Mr. Craigie was strenuously collecting? Then, Mr. Brewin later on intimidated the witness by demanding from him in a very impertinent tone the reply whether he did not know the law. As if nine-tenths of Bombay were expected to know it! As if poor wights of clerks would bother or mix themselves with the police instead of minding their own business! Of course, if the police was not such an odious body as it is, many would, perhaps, have voluntarily assisted. But here is the stern fact, and we appeal to every intelligent and impartial unit of the community to say whether we are rightly or wrongly echoing public voice in this matter. Is there not ample evidence in the many cross-questions put to Mr. Craigie's witnesses of the police attempting to throw discredit on the outrage theory? Was that the way to find out the truth? It ought to have shown no prejudice whatever to any theory. But it dare not deny that all through it has perversely attempted, hitherto at least, to cling to its own imaginary hypothesis, from what motive let its own conscience declare. Summarising, then, our arguments, we say, firstly, that if the police now complains through the Bombay Gazette that it should not have been assisted by Mr. Craigie in the investigation it is its own fault, and it is the victim of its own defiant attitude generally towards the public of Bombay; and, secondly, the tone, manner and spirit of its examination of Dr. Smith, and of the so-called "cross-examination" of Mr. Craigie's witnesses, specially of Arjun and the two clerks, clearly indicate that it is not inspired by the motive of detecting the real criminals. On the other hand, its apparent solicitude for that suspect Asláji is astonishing—so astonishing that we could say a great deal on it if we chose, but refrain from doing so.

21. The Rást Goftár (86), in its issue of the 24th May, writes:—It is satisfactory that Government have asked the Public Prosecutor to attend the Coroner's inquest. This may be taken as a recognition on their part, not only of the importance of the enquiry, but of the fact that the mystery is capable of another explanation than that which the police have offered under the pretence of a positive belief in it. We trust Mr. Frere will come to the enquiry with an open mind, and his questions to the witnesses will be made solely with the view of sifting the truth,—a view in which he will, of course, have the hearty concurrence of Mr. Craigie. There will be no different ways of examining the witnesses as Mr. Brewin was doing, according as they made statements in harmony with the police theory or not. There will no longer be any appearance of a division of the Coroner's court into two opposite camps. There will be no examination, cross-examination and re-examination of witnesses, as is done in courts of law, where there is the case of the complainant to uphold on the one hand and of the defendant on the other. If there are any criminals in the present case,—and the belief is gaining ground that there are,—there will no more be taken a line of action that practically went to shield them from the consequences of their crime. We know as a matter of fact that Colonel Wilson is as anxious as any one else that no mystery should hang round the awful deaths of the two poor innocent girls. We hope that he has succeeded in inspiring his men with the same honest zeal for the discovery of the truth. The best answer they can give to the aspersions which are freely cast upon them is to hunt up a clue to the murderers, if there has been foul play. It is stated that they have been supplied with fresh evidence which will support the evidence of the children, and, consequently, the theory of violence. If the police had before any shadow of excuse for the faith that was in them, they have now got sufficient material for abandoning that faith and working in the light of the evidence that has been forthcoming. And working in the light of that evidence would be working in consonance with a just and correct conception of their duty. Slowly the mystery is unravelling. The light is dim at present, but we feel confident that it will grow broad and clear, and the public shall yet know how the poor girls came by their terrible deaths. Slowly the curtain seems to be rising, and by working heart and soul on the supposition that a crime has been committed, the police can, if they choose, afford a vindication of the motive by which they have hitherto been actuated. If there has been foul play and they succeed in discovering it, it will be a glorious triumph of their reputation as detectors of crime.

22. The same newspaper, in another place, observes:—The Bombay Police have always ranged themselves against the Pársis, as a community, whenever a public calamity has befallen them, the latest occasion of such exhibition being the Rájábái Tower tragedy, and the former occasions were the Bombay riots of 1874 and the Tower of Silence case. However, the time has now arrived for the police to change its opinion of the tragedy and set about discovering the criminals by inducing one of them to turn 'Queen's evidence.'

23. The Káthiáwár Times (3), in its issue of the 26th May, writes:—The vernacular portion of the press has been rendering praiseworthy service to the public in the matter of the Rájábái Tower tragedy. It is satisfactory to see also that other English journals in the presidency, who stuck to the theory of accident at first, have been by degrees veering round to the popular theory. Are the powers of preception of the Vernacular press more acute or is the English press deliberately ignoring the matter, are questions which the public has to decide. Had the Advocate of India said three weeks before what it now says, a remarkable change would have been noticed in the attitude of the police. If the attitude of the police is regarded as queer, that of the two Bombay dailies cannot be regarded less so. What can account for this? Here in all probability two most atrocious murders have been committed, and none but most egregious fools can deny their commission looking to all the attendant circumstances; the public is crying for justice, and the guardians and representatives of the public, taking up a somewhat neutral position, seem to be complacently suggesting stupid and absurd theories to make the public believe that no offence at all has been committed! Such an instance is unparalleled in the annals of journalism in Bombay. If the public has cause to be dissatisfied with the police, it has a yet greater cause to be dissatisfied with the English press for its apathy and blind confidence in the police theory. Had this misfortune befallen two European girls, the English press would have gone mad with frenzy; they would have slashed the police right and left, blamed the Government in no measured terms for their silence, and, in short, would not have rested satisfied till they had seen the murderers brought to book. The Párai public, however, may derive some consolation from the fact that, notwithstanding this lamentable attitude of the police and the press, they have the entire sympathy of all nationalities, particularly the Europeans, who are very anxious to see the murderers punished. Would it then be too much to ask Government to place on special duty in connection with this tragedy Colonel Humfrey, the Inspector-General of Police, who is, probably, the best Police officer in the Bombay Presidency, with two Police Superintendents of proved detective ability under him? The public can no longer put up with a state of affairs which implies grave dereliction of duty on the part of the police. To vindicate the cause of justice and the majesty of law it would be advisable, we believe, to entrust the work of the police in connection with the matter to some more efficient detectives than Superintendents Brewin and McDermott, for they have so far failed and there does not appear to be the remotest chance of their ever succeeding. With Mr. Frere, the Crown Prosecutor, the Coroner will be better able to finish the inquest, and had the Government appointed him to watch the proceedings long before, by this time greater light would have been thrown upon the incident. It is sheer folly on the part of the police to stick to an absurd theory after the evidence of the children. The names of the murderers, it is rumoured, are already freely being given out in confidential circles, and it is impossible to believe that the police can be ignorant of them. His Excellency Lord Harris should no longer sit silent over the incident. He should give a bit of his mind to the officials concerned and lead them distinctly to understand what the Government and the public expect from them. We feel sure that His Excellency will feel considerably annoyed at this attitude of the police and their lack of detective ability. Never, it would appear, had the Bombay Police cut so ludicrous, so contemptible and so miserable a figure as it has done at the present time.

24. The Bombay Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 25th May, says that the following reports have within the last three days been circulated, though they were privately talked about and discussed by the people for several days past:—About a week ago Mr. Jehángir Behrámji Murzbán waited upon and communicated to Colonel Wilson, the Commissioner of Police, the information that he had received from a Mahomedan that a certain Márwádi, had in his possession a bundle of clothes which, if obtained by the police, would throw important light on the mysterious tower tragedy; that the name and address of the owner of the bundle of clothes were given by Mr. Murzbán, who also stated that the Mahomedan who gave him the information had sealed the bundle before delivery, and no difficulty would be experienced in the recovery of the bundle; that some police officers were told to enquire into the matter, but they took up the work about sixty hours after communication of the information, and are said to have reported that the Márwádi had no bundle of clothes and the Mahomedan who gave the information had started a rumour, and as the latter did not bear a good character his statement could not be believed. It is stated about this bundle of clothes that the two Mahomedans who accompanied Mánakji Asláji on 25th April last, the day of the tower fatality, to the tower, had in the long interval that had elapsed after the occurrence of the tragedy and before the arrival of the police on the spot, hastily run away, and that the clothes of one of them had been torn in the scuffle he had with the deceased ladies; that after arrival at home the latter Mahomedan hastily took off his torn clothes, made them into a bundle and threw it in a corner of his room, ordering his servant to conceal it, who carried out the order; that some days after this event the servant asked his master a loan of five rupees for the approaching Bakri Id holiday, but was slapped in the face by the latter; that this insult offended the servant, who, remembering the mysterious bundle of clothes, went and related the story to his brother, who was employed by a Mahomedan gentleman; that this Mahomedan gentleman having overheard the story had the bundle opened in his presence and found in a pocket of a waist-coat among the clothes a letter and currency notes for Rs. 40; that the letter was written by Mánakji Asláji, requesting the person to whom it was addressed to bring with him Rs. 40 to the University Tower to pay certain immoral women who were to go to the tower from Máhim; that after reading this letter the Mahomedan gentleman sealed up the bundle of clothes and left it with a Márwádi residing in his neighbourhood; and that a few days after this event the information about the bundle of clothes was communicated by the Mahomedan gentleman to Mr. Jehángir Murzbán.—Another report was that a Hindu gentleman had witnessed from the High Court building that one of the two deceased Párai girls was thrown from the tower; that this gentleman is a clerk in the High Court, who was at the time drinking water with his face turned towards the tower; that he first saw two Pársi girls scuffling with a Pársi on the top terrace of the tower; that one of the girls fell from the tower and the other was thrown by the Pársi; that this clerk was much pressed to give evidence before the Coroner's inquest, but for reasons not known he appeared afraid to do so.—A Pársi young man named A'rdesar Edalji Reporter, who had offered his evidence before the Coroner, but which was not received, is stated to say that some days before the day of the fatality he visited the tower in company of a European friend and asked the havildár to open the clock-room, but on the latter's refusal to do so on the alleged ground that the room could not be opened after a certain hour, and his gestures and conduct having appeared suspicious, Mr. Reporter and his friend went to the clock-room by another door, where they witnessed a horribly immoral scene, and that the object of Mr. Reporter in making this statement is to show that the tower has been a rendezvous for immoral purposes and that the suspicious conduct of the havildár ought to be enquired into.

25. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 26th May, says that the information about the bundle of clothes is stated to have been given to the Police Commissioner at about four o'clock in the afternoon of Thursday last, but no enquiry was made about it by the police until midnight of Saturday following, that is, until fifty-six hours had elapsed since communication of the information; that an important witness in the matter of the bundle has disappeared; that this witness is the servant of the Mahomedan gentleman who had conveyed the information to Mr. J. B. Murzbán; that this servant is said to have left for his native place, which is however not known, and that his relations even did not know that he was going to leave Bombay.

26. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 29th May, says that Mr. J. B. Murzbán has, in his explanation in regard to the bundle of clothes, stated that the Mahomedan gentleman who gave him the information about the bundle is employed in the High Court, and asserted that on the morning of the next day of the tragedy several police officers visited the place of the Mahomedan and other police officers visited the same place in the noon and made some fuss, and this excited the suspicion of the servant of the Mahomedan; that Mr. Murzbán requested Colonel Wilson to confiscate the bundle of clothes at once by going himself or sending a trustworthy officer, and stated that the Mahomedan gentleman was ready to accompany him or his officer and to put him in possession of the bundle; that the Commissioner promised to make an early enquiry into the matter; that without doing anything in the meanwhile the servant was arrested by Superintendent Brewin at 12 o'clock on the night of Friday and released on Sunday morning; that the police went in search of the parcel on Saturday night, but no bundle was forthcoming, the Márwádi having denied all knowledge of it as well as of his next-door neighbour, the Mahomedan gentleman; and that the Mahomedan gentleman has recorded his statement before the police to the same effect.

26. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 30th May, observes that the witnesses produced by the police in connection with the Rájábái Tower fatality belong to the ignorant classes, their evidence proving none of the three theories about the catastrophe—accident, suicide or murder,—that the witnesses produced by Mr. Craigie as well as those who came forward of their own free will have shown, on the other hand, that the deceased were subjected to violence, and that if not both the deceased, at least one of them was hurled from the topmost balcony of the tower,—the evidence of the three Pársi children who came out unscathed from the severe ordeal of a searching cross-examination to which they were subjected, and that of sepoy Arjun Ráma and a Pársi gentleman, being most material, and that the police ought now to accept the theory of murder and work it out.

28. With reference to the Coroner's enquiry into the same fatality, a correspondent of the Jáme Jamshed (84), in its issue of the 26th May, questions the conduct of the police of Bombay for not producing before the Coroner's inquest a Pársi named Banáji, who was the first to visit the spot on which the corpses of the deceased ladies were discovered, Mr. Jamsetji Dhanjisháh Contractor, who knows something about the two Mahomedans who are alleged to have accompanied Mánakji Aláji to the tower, a havildár of the Telegraph Department who is said to have witnessed the payment of a rupee by the said two Mahomedans to the peon in charge of the tower when leaving it, and the Bengali Babu's son who had accompanied his father to the tower, and for failing to produce evidence in due sequence.

29. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 27th May, considers that the cross-examination of the three Pársi children by Mr. Frere, the Government Solicitor, has convincingly shown that the deceased Bachubái and Perozbái were the victims of an indecent assault and either threw themselves from the tower to save their honour or were thrown down by their murderers, and hopes that the suspected persons will now be taken up by the police for the purpose of collecting further proofs against them, and that if it fails to do so, either Mr. Frere or Government will advise it to adopt that course.

30. A correspondent of the same, under his real name of Rustamji Hormasji Nádarsháh, a writer of telegrams at Paydhuni, states that on 27th April, two days after the tower fatality, Krishnaráo Punáji, the havildár at the Paydhuni Telegraph Office, informed him that he witnessed two Pársi ladies going up the tower with the permission of the sepoy sitting at the door of the tower, and that immediately afterwards two Mahomedans and a Pársi went to the same sepoy to allow them to go up the tower, that one of the Mahomedans gave a rupee to the sepoy, who permitted them to go up and left the place after locking the door of the tower from outside. The Jáme states that this telegraph havildár is said to have made similar statements before Mr. H. Black, Telegraph Master at Paydhuni, and at another appropriate place.

31. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 30th May, says that the family of the deceased Bachubái and Perozbái, who ought to get the legal assistance of either the Government Solicitor or the Advocate-General at the Coroner's inquest, have been put to the heavy expense of engaging a Solicitor on their own account in order to make an attempt to find out the guilty parties, and yet the police frequently brings forward new theories. Certainly, observes the Jáme, Government ought not to sit silently looking at this, but ought to do the needful.

32. The Káthiáwár Times (3), in its issue of the 27th May, writes:—The Times of India comes to the rescue of the police in connection with the bundle story, and says that the police "have thoroughly investigated the allegation and ascertained that it was without foundation." It may be so; but why was the alleged delay of sixty hours? That is what the public should like to know. The Advocate of India says that the brother of the Mahomedan servant who took away the bundle from his master's house has suddenly disappeared within the last week. This, if true, points to the indispensable necessity on the part of the police for conducting inquiries in such cases with utmost promptitude. The complaint of the police that they were deprived of an opportunity of making prompt use of the evidence of the Pársi children, who have been produced at a late stage of the enquiry by Mr. Craigie, seems to be quite frivolous. If Mr. Craigie refrained from producing the children at the first stage of the enquiry, it might be due to the general impression produced by the attitude assumed by the police a couple of days after the unfortunate occurrence. Mr. Craigie is, besides, an astute attorney and he might have done so in the interests of his clients. But it must be mentioned that the course pursued by Mr. Craigie is regarded by the ablest of lawyers as the best under the circumstances. The evidence produced by him affords a striking contrast to the evidence produced by the police. What evidence has the police produced beyond that in support of an insane theory? In this matter, as the public and the police seem to be in dire conflict, we hope it will be deemed advisable by Government to entrust the enquiry to more efficient hands. Most unprejudiced men are necessary to detect the guilt. The evidence of child Nawázbái goes greatly to establish the theory that foul murders have been committed. The child seems to have been subjected to a pretty severe cross-examination by Mr. Frere, and yet she has given, looking to her age, the brief space of time she had been at the tower and the excitement, very satisfactory answers. Under such an examination even an adult would break down. The evidence of the children has not only sufficiently corroborated the popular theory of murder, but has established that theory. The police have obtained the best possible clue, and if they do not succeed in tracking the murderers they shall have to thank themselves for it. The tower tragedy, however, seems to point unmistakably to the fact that the Bombay Police are hardly capable of dealing with cases out of the common way. The attack by a Bombay paper on Dr. Thomas Blaney is entirely undeserved and the public has treated it with the contempt it deserved. If any of the Government officials has kept himself cool and kept his wits about him at this exciting juncture, it is the Coroner, whose firm attitude has brought credit alike to himself and the Government he has the honour to serve. [The Samsher Bahddur (117) and the Satyavakta (119) of the 22nd, the Satyá Mitrá (118) of the 24th, the Surat Akhbár (87) of the 25th and the Broach Samáchár (95) of the 28th May express similar sentiments.]

33. The Kaiser-i-Hind (85), in its issue of the 24th May, writes:—We believe we only echo the public voice when we say that there is as marked a difference between the character, trustworthiness and value of the evidence produced by Mr. Craigie since Saturday week and that submitted by the police during a fortnight after a week's previous incubation, as between Ormasdes and Ahriman. It is superfluous to observe that the investigation for the first time has thrown light on the mystery. Whether it will be entirely cleared up or not, remains to be seen. But there cannot be the least doubt in the simple and unsophisticated narrative of the hamál and the three children. The former stood the "cross-examination" of the police for over three hours, which, however, elicited nothing to cast any suspicion on the veracity of his evidence. The childen's narrative is of the highest legal importance, for it deals directly with the suspect Asláji. And though they will be subjected to "cross-examination" to-morrow, we have not the slightest fear of their standing the brunt of the double fire of Messrs. Frere and Brewin. But since the Government has now deemed it wise to direct the Public Prosecutor to watch the inquest, we venture to make another suggestion which, it is to be hoped, will be adopted to meet the ends of justice and truth. It is time that the prejudiced police which is now in charge of the case should also be asked to withdraw. We are convinced that no good would come from them. Let some other Superintendents of Police hitherto unconnected with the case be asked to help the Public Prosecutor—we mean, one or two such as have no preconceived fads or Quixotic notions in their heads about the cause of the shocking fatality,—or let some clever police be brought down from England or the Continent. The name of Mr. Cobb, who, we believe, had something to do with the Dádar murder case and the recent Khoja murder case, has been suggested to us. We personally know nothing about him. All we say is this. Withdraw the present staff in charge and put in another in whom the public at large may have confidence. In fact, the entire set now conducting the enquiry should be changed. If this be done at once, we are convinced that the perpetrators of the foul deed, which has horrified Bombay and which is certain to remain memorable for a hundred years at least to come, would be immediately brought to the bar of justice and the double murder would be avenged. Government has now a golden opportunity to concede this popular demand, and we trust it will have the wisdom to pay deference to it by adopting the suggestion without the least possible delay.

34. The Kaiser-i-Hind (85), in its issue of the 24th May, writes:—Last week, we observed, as laymen, in what essential respects the evidence of the Coroner's Surgeon was wofully misleading and even unacceptable to the ordinary reasoning powers and senses which Providence has endowed us with. We pointed out how absurd was the theory of the fall leading to the injuries on the thighs and breasts and to the rents in the clothing of the two unhappy ladies. We observed that it was contrary to fact and opposed to nature. We were also of opinion that the woful neglect to examine their clothes was not only a grave error of judgment, but a piece of culpable negligence. Summing up the analysis of the evidence, we did not hesitate to pronounce our emphatic opinion that the evidence of the Coroner's Surgeon was absolutely valueless for the purposes of tracing the cause of the mysterious deaths. We are glad to observe from the three very able letters over the signature of "B." that have appeared in the columns of the Bombay Gazette that every conclusion of ours has been corroborated. That "B." is a medical expert of growing eminence who could be matched against a dozen experts of better qualifications than the Coroner's Surgeon, goes without saying. For the several reasons given by him, "B." holds the evidence of the Coroner's Surgeon to be "valueless." Thus our opinion, which was founded on common sense, is now confirmed by this versatile medical expert. What has the police to say to it? And is the Coroner's Surgeon prepared to respond to the challenge? We consider his own medical reputation at stake, and the sooner he either contradicts "B." or retracts the evidence he so light-heartedly tendered to the Coroner the better. We trust that the Coroner and the jury will carefully bear in mind that evidence and consider whether it is at all rational and acceptable of belief in arriving at a just and unbiassed verdict. It also strikes us whether after the severe exposure of the so-called medical evidence Government should call upon the Coroner's Surgeon to either give a satisfactory rejoinder or retire from the post. In the interests of the public we think the Government is bound to take steps to clear up the conflict of opinion. Nothing could be better than to call upon that official to reply what he has to say to the challenge publicly made by "B."

Complaint of the Bombay Police regarding the holding back of evidence by the aggrieved parties in the Rájábái Tower tragedy considered unfounded.

35. The same newspaper says:—We have in our first article combated at length the unfounded complaint of the police regarding the holding back of evidence by the aggrieved parties. The children's evidence is, as is now too well known, the most material. Now, as a matter of fact, the Bombay Gazette itself gave a long account of the statement of the hamál and the children in its issue of the 4th May; and it is a fact that as back as 30th April last, the police were made fully acquainted with the statements of the children by the editor of a vernacular contemporary. This was done 12 hours prior to the statement being made to Mr. Craigie. How in the teeth of such stubborn facts the police or its apologists dare to complain that they have a grievance on this head passes our comprehension.

36. The same newspaper writes:—It is universally considered that the attack made on the Coroner last week by the Bombay Gazette was not only unwarranted, but atrabilious and malignant. It would seem as if it had its origin in some personal rancour or grudge. Who is defying the public and casting grave public interests to the wind—the Coroner or the police? Will the Gazette tell the public what is the proper function of the police in case of inquest? Is it to cross-question and be-little evidence or to collect evidence, from whatever quarter forthcoming, and to link together the various parts as to make it a consistent whole and establish crime? The police is not called upon by the Crown to sit in judgment on the preliminary inquiry, but to get at facts. But what has it been doing? Is it necessary to say that it is madly endeavouring to throw doubt by every conceivable means on the evidence which Mr. Craigie's clients are using all their best efforts to produce? Is not this departing from its legitimate function? And when the Coroner, by virtue of his undoubted right and authority, tries to repress that extraordinary bias of the police and warns it to remain within its legal bounds, he is rated!

Alleged indecent practice prevailing among Kunbi women of Násik and Panchavati on a certain day of the year.

37. A correspondent of the Indu Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 25th May, says that on the day of the Akshayatritiya (the third day of the bright half of the lunar month of Vaishákha) Kunbi women of Násik and Panchavati assemble on the banks of the river on their respective sides and sing devotional songs, and ridicule one another by making indecent gestures at each other, and a number of low people assemble to witness this offensive gathering. The correspondent requests the leading men of Násik to exert their influence to put a stop to this unseemly exhibition.

A suggestion for the improvement of the mofussil police in the Bombay Presidency.

38. The Shri Shivdji (63), in its issue of the 22nd May, in referring to the resolution passed at the Fourth Provincial Conference held at Poona for the improvement of the police, observes that an increase to the salaries of the subordinates in the Police Department will not improve its administration, but if a few experienced officers from the police of the city of Bombay are transferred to the mofussil due improvement will be effected.

A complaint against the Head Constable of the Zámpa police station at Surat.

39. The Gujarátí (81), in its issue of the 24th May, observes :—A correspondent writes to us from Surat that a Bohra quarrelled with the Head Constable of the Zámpa police station in that city and assaulted him, whereupon the latter so severely beat his opponent that a weak person would have met with his death. The Bohra was then hand-cuffed and taken by the constable to his superior officer, who released him on bail. In our opinion, the constable ought not to have taken the law into his own hands and beaten the Bohra in such a brutal manner. We request the police authorities of Surat to take due notice of the constable's conduct.

PART II.—Education.

Disapproval of the circular recently issued by the Director of Public Instruction, Bombay, with regard to physical exercise in schools.

40. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 24th May, writes :—An evil has been brought to light. It is that physical exercise, like everything else that is taken in hand enthusiastically in the beginning, is over-done. The Director of Public Instruction has for that reason sent a warning round to his subordinates that gymnastics and school games are to be practised with discretion, that sickly boys are to be excused partially or wholly, and that in case of objections being made by parents their wishes are to be followed. This is intended to prevent the evil effects of an over-strain. But, we fear, the fresh instructions, if as unwisely followed as the first insisting on physical exercise was, would remedy the last evil only by a reversion to the state of things in the beginning. The exhaustion of the body is as bad as, perhaps worse than, no exercise. The most important question is, where to stop. Sickly boys, or weak boys rather, must be partly or wholly excused, the Director says. Yet, it is the weak boy that stands in much greater need of exercise than the strong boy. He wants it most. In certain schools (they may be very few in number) weak boys are especially taken in hand. They are desired to begin with very mild exercise. Sometimes a walk suffices for them. As they grow stronger and become able to stand greater fatigue, they are required to join in other forms of exercise. Boys desirous of being excused altogether should be suffering from some malady that renders them quite unfit for physical exercise, or should produce a medical certificate to that effect. This course appears to be a much better one than to grant exemption to a student because he is physically weak. It is the weak that must be especially taken care of. That part of the Director's instructions that leaves the important matter of physical exercise entirely to the wishes of the parents is equally objectionable. There are parents who have learnt to understand the interests of their children. There are some that have not reached that stage yet. Parents may be left to specify a fair excuse for making an exception in the case of their boys. A sensible teacher will know how to weigh it, where to make the concession, and where not. He may, in certain instances, make an attempt to persuade the parents as he wishes. But any good that he can do this way will be impossible under orders that make it imperative on him to follow the parents' wishes, whatever they may be. If the parents once erred in one direction in the matter of physical exercise, if the heads of schools have erred since in another, the recent order of the Director of Public Instruction errs in a new direction. Perhaps, the Inspectors have not put him in possession of all the facts to enable him to arrive at a correct conclusion for the whole department. We do not doubt that in certain places there may be a great necessity for the stringent rules now made. If it is so, the rules should have a limited local application. If the rules are followed literally, the interests of physical exercise, particularly in the mofussil towns, will suffer greatly, and before long a necessity might arise for a modification of the recent circular. [The Mahratta (4) of the same date expresses similar sentiments.]

41. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 24th May, writes:—The Department of Education has a rule prohibiting Government High Schools from admitting any boy from any school of the same place unless and until he has completed the full course of that school. The principle involved in this rule is a good one. No doubt, considerable inconvenience and harm to the cause of discipline result from perfect freedom in regard to admission. The experience in Poona before a similar rule was adopted by the managers of private educational institutions imposing certain restrictions on promiscuous admission of students, was that students left one school and joined another on very frivolous grounds. There was a good deal of what is called migration. There was a certain percentage of students which, like Mr. Parnell's party a few years back, appeared to have resolved to hold the balance evenly between rival institutions, of course to their own profit in the shape of fees saved. The rule regarding leaving-certificates has partially put a stop to the evil. Then further good was done by the local private schools having adopted the departmental rule as to admission of students from competing institutions. But there is one consideration in regard to this rule to which we wish to draw the attention of the authorities that be. Although it is desirable that so far as possible the student should not leave an institution, after having once joined it, until he has completed the full course which that school can teach, yet it might happen that the teaching in some of the upper standards might be very defective. Especially there is greater chance of this in regard to standards where difficult and higher subjects have to be taught. It might thus be very disastrous to the student to be confined to that particular institution. We think the rule ought not to be a hard and fast one. From the Bombay Educational Record for this month we see that an exception has been made in the case of the Elphinstone High School, Bombay. We therefore suggest that in regard to mofussil High Schools the rules may be so modified that the head masters of institutions should have discretionary power to admit a student from a rival institution after taking due precaution to see that his desire to leave the school is not the result of whim, and is moreover sanctioned by his parent or guardian. Private schools, of course, would follow suit.

Comments on the new rule of the Bombay Educational Department regarding the admission of students into Government High Schools.

Part III.—Railways.

42. The Dnyánodaya (11), in its issue of the 28th May, writes:—The G. I. P. Railway has not yet discovered the art of arranging the time-tables of its trains so as to please everybody. Those coming to Bombay from Ahmednagar, for instance, find their trains fairly convenient, but those who are going to Ahmednagar are greatly discommoded by the delays to which they are subjected. Those who leave for Ahmednagar by the mail train have to wait at Dhond from 4-40 A.M. to 10-40 A.M., or six hours. For passengers going to stations on the Dhond and Manmád Railway no more inconvenient arrangement could well be made. We suppose it is impossible to please everybody; but passengers going to Ahmednagar and other stations on that line are just as worthy of consideration as those leaving there for Bombay. An extra train connecting with the mail at Dhond is not asking too much from the railway authorities.

Inconvenience suffered by passengers going from Bombay to Ahmednagar owing to their detention at the Dhond Station.

Part IV.—Municipalities.

43. In noticing the Government resolution of the 11th May on the sanitary work of the Poona Municipality, the Jame Jamshed (84), in its issue of the 28th May, says:—We do not agree with the drift of this resolution. The Poona Corporation has properly shown that it has under its present constitution done more sanitary work than was performed by the administration of 1883 with its Collector-president, supporting its assertion with actual proofs. This defence of the corporation has proved beyond doubt that the Poona City has fared better under the present régime than under that of the Collector-president. Of course, the corporation would have been able to do more than what it has achieved, if local self-government had met with due encouragement from the official world. The controversy between Government and the Poona Municipality is to end with certain changes in the District Municipal Act that will enable the larger mofussil municipalities to delegate their powers to responsible and competent executive officers. If due care is not taken in this particular, local self-government is sure to come into disrepute. It is therefore to be hoped that some Native members will be appointed to the committee which will shortly assemble at Poona to deliberate on this question, in order that the views of the Native public may be placed before Government about the reservation of right to the municipalities to appoint their own executive officers, as desired by the Poona Municipality.

A complaint regarding the house-tax levied by the Kapadvanj Municipality in the Kaira District.

44. The Satyavakta (119), in its issue of the 29th May, observes:—The scale of the house-tax imposed by the Kapadvanj Municipality in the Kaira District is already exorbitant, and sometimes notices for increased tax are served upon householders, a written application from a house-owner for remission of the increased amount being met with the oral reply to pay the tax at once. Either this exorbitant tax should be abolished or the schedule revised, as the people of Kapadvanj are very poor.

The imposition of house-tax by the Ránder Municipality in the Surat District.

45. The Gujarát Darpan (80), in its issues of the 24th and 28th May, observes:—The Ránder Municipality, in the Surat District, having recently passed a resolution to impose a house-tax, one of the municipal commissioners has resigned and some others intend following him. The new levy has spread dissatisfaction among the townsmen, who being poor this tax ought not to have been imposed at all. [The Gujarát Mitrá (82) and a correspondent of it, in its issue of the 24th May, express similar sentiments.]

Inconvenience suffered by travellers on the old road between Sangameshvar and Ratnágiri.

46. A correspondent of the Jagan Mitrá (38), in its issue of the 25th May, says that much inconvenience and many hardships are suffered by travellers on the old road between Sangameshvar and Ratnágiri on account of the absence of trees and drinking water for several miles together, and requests the Local Board to supply these wants.

PART V.—Native States.

Remarks on the Manipur despatches.

47. The Indu Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 25th May, writes:—The official papers which are published make it clear, what has been, in fact, clear from the first, that the Manipur disaster was the result of the overweening confidence and aggressiveness of the British officers. How far Mr. Quinton's action in seeking to arrest the Senápati in darbár and subsequently by force was justified by his instructions from the Foreign Office is not yet clear, as the letter of instructions has not yet been published. The Government of India, indeed, strongly protests against the suggestion of treachery, and, probably, no treachery was intended. But it is certain that the British officers counted entirely beside their host. The Manipuris, whatever their savageness, were justified in acting in self-defence, in suspecting the intentions of the British officers, and in endeavouring to elude the arrest. When the British took up the offensive and attacked them, they met force by force. In thus meeting the force arrayed against them they out-numbered the English troops and overpowered them. The escort accompanying Mr. Quinton was selected in consultation with two high military officers, but the choice was evidently made in a spirit of contempt of the enemy, and the same recklessness was displayed in the final action. Thus far the Manipuris were little to blame. As to the deaths of Mr. Quinton and his party there is some conflict of testimony. There is at least one witness, however, who supports the Manipur version that the officers were at first treated with respect and that after a long interview they set on their way back quite safe. It was on the way back that one Manipuri struck Mr. Grimwood (who, by the way, will receive the meed of his act in a few days) and the blow was a signal for a general massacre. According to this account the massacre was not a deliberate act on the part of the Manipur authorities, but was the result of popular frenzy. This would greatly diminish the responsibility of the Manipur officials. Almost all the Manipur dignitaries have been apprehended, including the Jubráj and the Senápati. How they are to be dealt with and what the eventual settlement is to be is still a matter of doubt. [The Rást Goftár (86), the Kaiser-i-Hind (85), the Mahrátta (4), the Gujarátí (81) and the Gujarát Mitrá (82), in their issues of the 24th May, and the Shri Shiváji (63) of the 22nd idem express similar sentiments. The Poona Vaibhav (53) of the 24th May, in repeating similar sentiments, expresses its fear that Manipur will be annexed to the British Indian territory, and adds that the Senápati did well in escaping to the jungles.]

Rewarding of the detachment of eighty military sepoys which under Lieutenant Grant captured and held Thobal against a large force of the enemy in the recent rising in Manipur recommended

48. The Jáme Jamshed (84), in its issue of the 29th May, says:—It is gratifying that Lieutenant Grant should have been awarded the Victoria Cross for his conspicuous bravery and devotion in a fight with a large force of the enemy in the recent rising at Manipur. But what about the detachment of eighty military sepoys at the head of whom Lieutenant Grant kept 2,000 Manipuris at bay and captured and held Thobal. In his account of the action at Thobal, Lieutenant Grant has admitted that without the aid of his eighty brave comrades he could not have achieved the success he secured. It is to be much regretted that neither the Secretary of State for India nor the advisers of Her Imperial Majesty thought it meet to notice the brave conduct of the small detachment. It is however to be hoped that these eighty men and the two military sepoys who have succeeded in apprehending the Senápati will be duly rewarded.

Remarks on the Parliamentary papers on the Cambay disturbances.

49. The Rást Goftár (86), in its issue of the 24th May, writes:—It would appear from the Parliamentary papers which have been published on the Cambay disturbances that the military used no more force than was necessary in dispersing the thousand or so of rustics who had collected in the city. This is rather hard to believe, considering the heavy fatality which attended the charging of the mob by the military and the immunity of the troops from any casualty, barring a few slight bruises and scratches. The rustics had been armed mostly with no more formidable weapons than clubs, and they could not, therefore, be so very dangerous to the peace and security of the State as to necessitate a lamentably heavy loss of life. They refused to disperse, it is true. But the fault which they committed by disobeying the orders made to them was at least partially atoned for by the fact that they had some real and pressing grievances, and that they considered that the only way of bringing them home to the minds of the authorities was by means of a demonstration in the shape of a large gathering They thought that the late Diván, Mr. Shámráo Laud, was the principal cause of all the ills which the State was suffering from, and consequently they demanded with vehemence and persistence that he must go. Even if it were allowed that in charging and dispersing the crowd the troops behaved as humanely as the circumstances admitted, there ought to have been furnished some satisfactory explanation of the grave accusation made against the troops that, flushed with the victory obtained over unarmed rustics, they demolished temples and plundered houses. This accusation was seriously and authoritatively made, and if it was groundless there ought to be an emphatic and authoritative denial of it. But all this, however sad, belongs to the irrevocable past. We are more practically concerned with the present and the future of Cambay. It is universally admitted that Cambay was not all in touch with the progressive spirit of the times, that the administration had many glaring defects which cried for reform, and that Mr. Laud was not the best of administrators that would be found for the State. The old order has changed and has given place to the new which, we believe, has been hailed with satisfaction by the subjects of the Nawáb. Here was a case in which British intervention was necessary for the welfare of the State, which will certainly improve under its healthy and humanising agency. [The Gujarát Darpan (80) and the Gujarátí (81) of the same date, the Hitechchhu (83) of Ahmedabad of the 28th, the Satyavakta (119) of the 29th and the Kaira Vartamán (119) of the 27th May express similar sentiments, some of them regretting that Mr. Shámráo Náráyan Laud, the late Diván, to whose alleged mal-administration they attribute the disturbance, has not been arraigned for his misdoings.]

Protection of Native Courts from European adventurers desired.

50. After expressing approval of the circular order issued by the Bombay Government to its Political officers at Native Courts, requesting them to desist from accepting hospitalities from Native Chiefs and Princes to whose Courts they are accredited, the Jáme Jamshed (84), in its issue of the 28th May, observes:—The great pests to Native Princes and Chiefs are the European petty tradesmen or adventurers, who seldom depart without securing more or less the objects of their visit, while some of them prove great bores. It is therefore desirable that the political officers should be instructed by Government not to allow such Europeans an access to Native Courts, which need protection particularly from the European "adventurers."

Visit of Colonel Hancock, Acting Political Agent, Káthiáwár, and Mr. Cooke, Acting Political Agent, Cambay, to the Shetrunja Hill in the Káthiáwár Agency and the insult alleged to have been given by them to the Jains.

51. In alluding to the visit of Colonel Hancock, Acting Political Agent, Káthiáwár, and Mr. Cooke, Acting Political Agent, Cambay, on the 28th March last to the Shetrunja Hill in the Pálitána State, in Káthiáwár, and to the insult alleged to have been given by them to the Jains by walking over certain prohibited places with their boots on, the Praja Mat (115) of the 23rd May and four other Gujaráti newspapers observe that if the allegation be true, due notice ought to be taken by Government of the conduct of these officers, as the Shetrunja Hill is held very sacred by the Jains, whose feelings are said to be offended by this conduct of Colonel Hancock and Mr. Cooke. The Gujarát Mitrá (82) of the 24th May suggests that the two officers and the English lady who accompanied them ought to be criminally prosecuted by the Jains for desecrating their sacred place.

1. The Pramod Sindhu (1), in its issue of the 22nd May, says:—Revision survey and settlement in Berár has of late attracted the attention of cultivators as well as of those who have some concern for them. The cultivators shudder when they are told that the revision survey that has been commenced in the Wun and Básim Districts and that will shortly extend its operations to others, will be accompanied by a revision settlement which, they understand, means nothing less than "enhanced assessment." They already know from experience that after the payment of rent they are now paying, the margin left for their subsistence is less than the value of the labour they have expended on their lands. When such is the state of the land and land-holders, there is nothing wonderful if the cultivators contemplate the survey and settlement question with so much fright. As regards the state of cultivators it is the same as that of the other Indian rayats. It is clear enough that the agriculturists are not well off. They are unable to pay without difficulty and pressure the present assessment of their lands. They are, with a few exceptions, compelled at the time of paying their land revenue to resort to money-lenders, whose exorbitant demands the poor borrowers are perforce compelled to accede to. Thus the sale-proceeds of their produce are fairly disposed of in meeting the expenses that were incurred at the ploughing and weeding season and high interest on loans. It must be borne in mind that a large portion of the land revenue paid to Government represents no surplus produce raised on the soil, but merely fresh debts incurred by the cultivators. The increased indebtedness of cultivators will be made palpable by the increased number of documents registered every year. Day by day increasing stamp revenue is not an unimportant indication of the ruin of the people. The assessing officers will, therefore, do well to mix themselves up with the poor agricultural classes in order to know their actual condition. If this is done these officers will positively come to know that the rayats are really unable to bear any increase in the land assessment. The increase in assessment under contemplation reminds us of the deplorable state of Sholápur, Nagar, Sátára and Poona in the Bombay Presidency, the cultivators of which have been crushed under over-assessments. Notwithstanding that they had been rendered quite unable to pay the assessment, the Government unscrupulously increased it. The poor agriculturists at last found remedy in the relinquishment of their fields,—fields which proved to them a source of distress rather than of maintenance. At lastthe Agriculturists' Relief Act was passed. The total revenue of Berár from all sources, including the land revenue which alone amounts to Rs. 67,34,751, is Rs. 1,18,35,814 per annum, and the expenditure is Rs. 1,02,51,177, leaving a net surplus of Rs. 15,84,137. As the balance is sufficiently large there is no necessity of increasing any taxes. The surplus is paid to His Highness the Nizám. It is not compulsory, as far as is known, that the surplus should be paid to the Nizám in a fixed amount. It is therefore clear that the financial results of the Berár administration do not afford any reason to Government to increase as a matter of necessity the present rates of land assessment. Great injustice appears to have been done at the time of the initial survey and settlement operations by excessively assessing the lands situated in the most populous part of Berár. Rates in several parts of Berár differ from one another. If Government find themselves under a necessity to increase the land assessment they should raise the assessment of such lands only as were at the last settlement assessed at low rates but now enjoy greater facilities for raising large crops. In doing so Government should, however, keep up the same maximum standard of rates as has hitherto been in practice. Some of the low-taxed lands may be raised to the level of the other lands that have been assessed with higher rates, provided the former have really improved their status, Appointments in the Revenue and Judicial Departments in Berár.

2. The Vaidarbh (2), in its issue of the 23rd May, writes:—We really fail to see on what principle appointments in the higher grades of the lower service in the Revenue and Judicial Departments of Berár are made now-a-days. The rules of the departments strictly enjoin that promotion to officials should be given on the principle of seniority in passing the Departmental Examination, But the rules are observed more in their breach than in their observance. There are twenty-two Tahsildárs in the province, out of whom there are at present nearly ten who have passed no examination at all, and there are only eight who have passed the Higher Standard Examination. The rule is that no person should be made permanent Tahsildár until he has passed the Higher Standard Examination. In the same way out of 10 Clerks of Court (6 Deputy Commissioners' and 4 Small Causes Courts) there are only two who have passed the Higher Standard Examination, and four have passed no examination at all. The officials who have passed no examination have been appointed to the posts they now hold after the rules came into force. Only a very few of these held the posts prior to the introduction of the rules. The authorities who make such appointments would have sufficient excuse for breaking the rules if it had been a fact that there were no qualified candidates for the vacancies. We can even now name some Náib Tahsildárs and Deputy Clerks of Court who have passed the Higher Standard Examination, but have been passed over and their claims ignored in favour of those who have passed no examination or have passed only the Lower Standard Examination. This was, indeed, never expected under the régime of Mr. Plowden, who in the very beginning of his career gave promise of being a very just ruler, strictly following the rules and regulations of the several departments of the administration. When the making of appointments is left to the choice or discretion of subordinate officers there arises the danger of patronage being abused, and it is for this that every good administration makes rules laying down certain qualifications without possessing which no one shall be entitled to obtain a post. But if the administration would not care to see that the rules are observed, they had better not be made at all. If we closely look into some of the recent appointments we shall find that patronage has had much to do with them; and therefore we pray to the administration to put a stop to the system of patronage.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Part I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Information about British rule in India alleged to have been communicated by His Imperial Highness the Czarewitch to his august father.

1. The A'rydvart (20), in its issue of the 11th April last, contains an article (which is an extract from the Varhád Samáchár, a newspaper published in Berár) that mentions the principal points on which His Imperial Highness the Czarewitch is said to have addressed letters to his august father, the information given in them being gathered by the Prince from the diary which he kept while travelling in India. The information contained in these letters states that the people in India are hardworking but unhappy, that more attention is paid by the British rulers to strengthen their rule than to the advancement of the prosperity of the people, that the rulers are crafty, that the people are dissatisfied and in search of relief, that there is no doubt that the people are much worried, that the taxes are very heavy, that the people will one day think over their present depressed condition, that they do not enjoy any freedom, that the English are virtually exempted from the operation of the laws of the country which are unsuited to the people on account of the caste system among them, that in spite of ample revenue India is handicapped with a heavy public debt, that the commerce of the country has passed into the hands of Europeans, that the import of European articles has ruined indigenous manufactures, that the courts of justice which have supplanted the indigenous Panchâyat system are very expensive and unsuited to the country, and other similar matters.

Alleged opinion of His Imperial Highness the Czarewitch about the arrangements made by the British Government for the visits of Native Princes in India to him.

2. The Mahárashtra Mitra (45), in its issue of the 28th May, says:—No sooner did His Imperial Highness the Czarewitch enter Japan an attempt was made on his life, and thereupon His Imperial Highness is reported to have said to a high Japanese officer that he was at first surprised to see that the British would not allow him free access to the Indian Princes. However selfish the British Government may have been in not allowing its tributaries to form friendship with a foreign ruler, he must admit that he owed his safety in India, the people of which are mentioned in historical works to be uncivilized, to this policy of the British. He is further reported to have said that he did not wish any more to go against the British as they had formed friendship with his father; and he would consider it a disgrace to his nation if he failed to take revenge on Japan for the attempt made on his life.

Remarks on the declaration of Sir J. Gorst in Parliament about the policy under which India is governed.

3. The Mahratta (4), in its issue of the 31st May, writes:—We drew attention recently to the declaration of Sir John Gorst that "India is a despotic country; it is not a free country, which is governed by a very arbitrary and a very strong despotism." In India, where our daily experience tells us that the above-quoted remark of Sir John Gorst is very true, it will not cause much comment. It will only cause us to feel the more. It will make us feel that England, which boasts of being the most intensely freedom-loving country, cannot yet bear to look passively on what it is pleased to call its dependency being governed in any other wise than despotically. But why wonder at this? Did not free England act in the same way towards a people very much more deserving of freedom than we can hope to be for many a day to come? And yet very few Englishmen have the frankness to speak out their minds so freely and openly. They are afraid of public opinion in England. The people of England have learnt a lesson. Their ideas have become very much liberalised. They would not, if they knew, tolerate "a very arbitrary and a very strong despotism." Hence we find so many attempts made to gloss over unpleasant facts and hide the ugly truth from them. Mr. Schwanne, M. P., took up the words of the Under Secretary of State for India and asked his chief if he approved of them. He received a reply from Lord Cross marked "Private." Of course, as it was so marked we could not know what it contained. But the fact of its being so marked is itself significant. Mr. Schwanne again wrote to him and wanted the correspondence to be published. Thereupon Lord Cross wrote, without the endorsement this time, saying he would be prepared to answer any question in Parliament on the subject. He further compared the present security, happiness and prosperity under the British Government with the same under former rulers, the comparison being of course to the advantage of the present rule. So then the British Government can only boast of being better rulers than the Mogals and others! That is hardly creditable, we think.

Arrest of Abdul Rasoul by the Government of India condemned.

4. The Gujarát Darpan (80), in its issue of the 4th June, writes:—In arresting Abdul Rasoul the greatest indiscretion was committed by the Government of India, and it has been alleged that it was repeated in many more cases in the Panjáb. It may be said that Government was afraid of the mad and fussy proclamations of Dhulip Sing, and so was on the tiptoe of timid caution to check their effects which did not exist. The treatment which Abdul Rasoul subsequently received at the hands of the authorities was, to use the modest term, horrible, and had it not been for the pertinacity of Mr. Conybeare the public would not have heard of Abdul Rasoul and his wrongs. Imprisonment for nine months without trial seems at first illegal; but it is legal, yet not just. The almost unlimited powers given to Government to treat persons suspected of a political intrigue as they please are quite unsuited to the times. Suppose a Viceroy of the wrong-headedness of Lord Lytton came to India when the Indian National Congress was in full swing and (as would not be unlikely) many of its leaders were confined as political fire-brands in the dark cells of some strong fortress: can we not urge that the India of 1891 is not the India of 1827? These regulations were necessary at a time when the British power had to be consolidated, many powerful Native States existed, and even those acknowledging the suzerainty of the British Government were in an unsettled state. No necessity now exists for them, which are at any time liable to be misused; no necessity exists for them in the India of railways, post and telegraph. Above all, they are not required in the India of to-day. However, the Government of India will stick to them as fondly as a foolish mother would to her ugliest child. The impudent and impolitic defence of Sir John Gorst leaves no hope that the objectionable regulations will be abrogated. English writers and publicists have been holding up Russia as a model of a despotic country, where the liberty of the subject is at the disposal of the Autocrat. We ask, does the Indian Czar wield less power than he? Perhaps, the latter is more discreet. Let us hope that is not the only difference. It is desirable that an agitation for removing this power should be set on foot. It will meet with many rebuffs and disappointments, still the people must persevere. Why should we not hope that just as the death of Phulmoni Dasi led to the Consent Act, so may the wrongs of Rasoul lead to the divestment of the arbitrary powers wielded by Government? India is not a free country, as Sir John Gorst has said. True enough, and very candid! But the question to be considered is whether or not "it is fit to enjoy a modicum of freedom." Is it that the free Briton ceases to be a freeman as soon as he puts his foot on the Indian soil? If it be so, it is a grievance of his. If not, it is a great injustice to us Indians, between whom and Englishmen a distinction is observed. If England claims the loyalty of India, the latter claims a just and even treatment at the hands of Government. The existence of such regulations as the one about which we have heard so much, is a slur on the peaceful character of the Indian people. Once more we expect to be told, India is not a free country; it is a country where many despots reign. Then we ask, why is it that ever and anon it has been said that the Indian subjects of Her Majesty enjoy as much happiness as Englishmen? Why the shams of councils and laws and acts? We want none of them if all these can be upset by plans hatched in secret. If they are to remain shams (and the symptoms are such), clearly say so. Government by deception and in secret should be a thing of the past. Open, straightforward and honest ways are what we want. The Indian Government, with its many merits, has not them. The revival of all but dead regulations to achieve an end, kept back from the public, bespeaks the readiness of the Indian administration to resort to anything to gain a purpose. It would be quite a constitutional act if these old regulations were re-enacted by the Legislative Councils, shams as they are. Will they be brought before the Councils?

5. The Arunodayá (19), in its issue of the 31st May, contains a cartoon in which the Secretary of State for India is represented as taking money out of the pocket of the poor people of India and handing it over as pension to Mr. Crawford, who is alleged to have plundered the country. The British Lion is represented to be about to swallow a lump of flesh (Manipur), while a dog (the leaders of Indian Native society) is gnawing away a piece of bone representing social subjects.

6. The Dnyán Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 1st June, says:—The Manipur disturbances and the riots at Benares and Calcutta have led the Morning Post to apprehend a repetition of the Indian mutiny of 1857. The dissatisfaction created by several trifling causes is smouldering in the minds of the people and might one day lead to serious consequences, which ought to be avoided. There is, however, no ground at present to apprehend a mutiny. If the officers of Her Majesty's Government will keep before their mind's eye the sound maxim that the strength of Government consists in the contentment of the subject people and act accordingly, the latter will never entertain any disloyal feelings. The Morning Post observes that if Eurasians are given the rights enjoyed by Europeans they will zealously serve as volunteers, but this observation is shortsighted, since it suggests the making of an invidious distinction between Natives and Eurasians.

Fear of a mutiny expressed by the Morning Post of Allahabad pronounced groundless.

7. The Mahrátta (4), in its issue of the 31st May, writes:—So many grave questions are rising up before the House of Commons that it is quite likely that once more Lord Cross's Bill will be postponed. The Manchester Courier's London correspondent says that the chances of the Bill being taken up this session are small. He further remarks: "As the reform of the constitution of India is a matter requiring very careful consideration, and is not of urgent importance, nothing would be lost by postponing the Bill for a year." That is the feeling in India. If the question of the reform of the constitution of India is to be settled with a view to some permanency, then it is better that this very stinted measure of reform should be postponed. If we are to have a reform, let us have it in some substantial form. The House of Commons cannot now spare any very considerable portion of time for the consideration of Indian questions. It will not take up the question again for some years to come. It is therefore necessary that, when it does take up the question, it should be thoroughly and well considered and the settlement should have some element of finality in it.

Prospects of the Indian Councils Bill.

8. The Káthiáwár Times (3), in its issue of the 29th May, writes:—The Official Secrets Act, which was passed with such unseemly hurry, particularly, perhaps, to overawe the Vernacular press or those papers which exposed the shortcomings of the Government, is likely to remain a dead letter. The Englishman is stated to have been furnished with copies of the Manipur despatches three days before they were supplied to other journals. Why was it so? Can an official secret be surreptitiously communicated to a public journal if that paper is prepared to justify any measure of Government, however unjustifiable? But what can avail the Government of India the justification of a particular paper which is believed to have no very great reputation for fair criticism, when the whole course of proceedings of the Government of India in regard to Manipur has been regarded a bungle from beginning to end? It is most unfair that unprivileged communications should be made to individual newspapers which may be ready to hire out their columns to the Government for the purpose of misleading or misdirecting public opinion. Though the real object of the Act was the protection of public interests, it was not at all unlikely to be so worked as to produce a directly contrary effect.

Premature publication of a correspondence regarding Manipur in the Englishman and the Official Secrets Act.

9. The Rást Goftár (86), in its issue of the 31st May, writes:—Lieutenant Grant covered himself with glory at Thobal. He is now covered with honours by Her Majesty the Queen. The distinction of the Victoria Cross, as rare as it is coveted, has been conferred upon him. He has gained two steps in the service by being promoted first to the rank of Captain and then to that of Major. The young Lieutenant did wonders with his plucky band of eighty men against two thousand of the enemy. He captured Thobal, and while in it, he not only held his own against immense odds, but forced the enemy to sue for terms. The thrilling narrative of his exploits is the one bright chapter in the Manipur imbroglio. It is still more gratifying as one more instance of the nerve and pluck and daring displayed by British officers in an emergency. Lieutenant Grant snatched a victory from defeat—life from the very jaws of death. We suppose the heroic band of Native soldiers who stood by him and behaved so splendidly, will also be adequately rewarded. [The Mahrátta (4) of the 31st May and the Indu Prakásh (13) of the 1st June express similar sentiments.]

10. In noticing the list of Birthday honours, the Bombay Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 1st June, observes:—The largest number of these honours have, as has been usual of late, been bestowed on Government officials. The principles on which these honours are distributed among official circles are incomprehensible to the public. Among the fortunate individuals rewarded with these honours, there are some names which come before the public for the first time by their being selected for this favour; there are others who have never rendered appreciable services to the public, while there are some names which are painful to the people. The name of the Honourable Mr. Pritchard is of the last kind. He has been rewarded with the title of K.C.I.E. The public are unaware of any services of this officer that have been considered deserving of recompense. On the other hand, he has been disliked by them on account of his ábkári administrative policy having deprived numerous poor people of means of earning their livelihood and spread intoxication among the people. Besides Mr. Pritchard, there are several names in this year's list of honours that may be severely criticised or that are obscure. It seems that these honours are bestowed on officials who secure the good graces of Government or of their official superiors, without considering whether they have been able to render satisfaction to the public. [The Jáme Jamshed (84), in its issue of the same date, expresses similar sentiments, regretting that no benefactors of the public in one shape or another have been rewarded with any honours. The Ilást Goftár (86) of the 31st May and the Gujarát Darpan (80) of the 4th June observe that the Honourable Mr. Pritchard has done no good to the people to deserve the honour bestowed on him, but has simply filled the coffers of Government by his ábkári policy.]

11. The Indu Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 1st June, says:—The honours list in connection with Her Majesty's Birthday is of the usual kind. It is, on the whole, discriminating, and considered with reference to each province it is long enough. Bombay gets only two of the higher honours, a K.C.I.E. for the Honourable Mr. Pritchard and a C.I.E. for Khán Bahádur Mancharji Kávasji Murzbán. Both these selections are excellent of their kind. Mr. Pritchard, though unpopular in consequence of his salt and ábkári administration, is an able officer and has done valuable service to the State. Khán Bahádur Murzbán is mentioned in the Gazette as President of the Municipal Corporation, Bombay, and it is presumably for his work in that office that he gets the title. Mr. Murzbán made a very capable President, being unremitting in attendance, firm, quick, and impartial. Mr. Murzbán's services in other ways have been conspicuous, which must have contributed not a little to his selection for the honour. On every occasion of public demonstration Mr. Murzbán is an indispensable and willing worker. His genius and industry have always been the chief contributors to the success of our public fairs and illuminations. In other walks of life, too, Mr. Murzbán has done useful service. Of the smaller honours there is not much to say. There are two Shams-ul-Ulamas, but no Mahámahopádhyáya. We wonder if the fountain of honours in that respect has run dry or the Government does not think there is any Sanskrit scholar worthy of the honour. Perhaps, the exhibition of learning made by some Mahámahopádhyáyas during the recent discussion in connection with the Age of Consent Act has shown to Government the futility of the distinction. On the whole, we think that this periodical distribution of honours at regular intervals is an undesirable proceeding. It is very demoralising in its effects. It raises hopes, causes disappointments and leads to an amount of trouble and vexation which the general public has hardly any conception of. It, on the one hand, multiplies honours and cheapens their value, and, on the other, causes irritation by making invidious distinctions. It is an entirely pernicious system which makes the distribution a matter of course every six months. The military honours, too, are given with a free hand at the end of every little expedition. We wish an effort were made to make the distribution more rare and select, so as to reserve the honours for special services.

12. The Kdsids Mumbai (108), in its issue of the 1st June, regrets that the Mahomedan community is generally forgotten at the disposal of Birthday and other honours though there are many meritorious Mahomedan gentlemen, but is glad that His Highness Mir Ali Murád Khán Tálpur of Khairpur, Sind, has been rewarded with the distinction of Knight Grand Commander of the Indian Empire, which fact shows that the State, which, according to official reports, was mismanaged for some time, has recently improved, and Khán Bahádur Mir Abdul Ali of the Bombay Police has been made a 'Sirdar' in recognition of his valuable services.

13. The Rdst Goftdr (86), in its issue of the 31st May, writes:—No honours list can be absolutely perfect. There is no help for that. But it can be as perfect as human beings can make it. As a matter of fact, however, it is always far from attaining even that degree of perfection. There are always some names in the list which call forth no particular objection or commendation. There are some others about which the wonder is that they should so long have been omitted from such a list, and there are not a few about which one wonders how they go there at all. One of the names in the Birthday honours is that of a gentleman, who had earned the C.I.E. which he has now got, long before the present,—we mean Mr. M. C. Murzbán. It is only a month or two ago that in a sketch of his career given in this paper we repeated the hope that his claims will not long remain unrecognized. We need not recapitulate the story of his career as a self-made man. The monuments of his success are visible to all in the architectural ornaments of the city. The title has been long deferred, but richly earned.

Approval of the honour conferred on Mr. M. C. Murzbán, Executive Engineer, Bombay.

14. The same newspaper says:—In the Birthday honours list is Mr. Abdul Ali, Police Superintendent in the Detective Branch, Bombay. What special services, either within or beyond his official duty, have earned for him the honourable title of Sirdar, perhaps they know it better up there in Simla than in Bombay. But the honour comes most inopportunely at a time when the wonted detective skill of the police has done nothing to ferret out a clue to the most foul and heinous crime which engrosses the attention of the public. The skill has been employed the wrong way. A policeman is a mighty power in the land. The double-barrelled title of Sirdar and Khán Bahádur will add to the might and dignity which attaches to a police officer of his position. [The Gujarát Darpan (80), in its issue of the 4th June, expresses similar sentiments.]

Disapproval of the bestowal of the title of Sirdar on Khán Bahádur Mir Abdul Ali of the Bombay Police.

15. The Dnyán Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 4th June, says:—Dr. Pollen, the Agent for Sardárs in the Deccan, held on Saturday last the customary annual Darbár in honour of the birthday of Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen-Empress of India. During the course of his speech on the occasion, which in some respects was of more than usual interest, he briefly reviewed the principal events of the year that had closed. He had, of course, to refer to the Age of Consent Act and to the agitation in connection therewith. He justly observed that the leaders of the people "took opposite sides in that agitation," with the result that the Native community "was thus divided into hostile camps." The Legislature having, however, deemed it expedient to pass the legislative measure, Dr. Pollen reminded his audience, composed of the "natural leaders of the people," of their duty "to acquiesce cheerfully and loyally in the final decision of the Legislature, and to discourage to the utmost of their power vain and foolish agitation and idle and factious opposition to the law of the land"; and he wound up his observations on the subject by declaring that "it behoved them all, by example and by precept, to inculcate respect for, and obedience to, the laws." The agitation in this part of the country—we mean in the Bombay Presidency generally—in connection with the Age of Consent Act, both for and against it, may be aptly described as the faint echoes of a violent thunderstorm at a great distance, and not the thunderstorm itself or anything like it. The actual and real agitation was confined to Lower Bengal, and, perhaps, to some extent, to the bordering parts of the adjoining provinces. Elsewhere the agitation was more of an academical character than anything like the outcome of deeply stirred religious sentiment and prejudices, or of the would-be practical difficulties to be realized from the operation of the proposed measure. We believe we are correctly describing the situation in this presidency, when we say that no practical hardship was or is apprehended here, at any rate, by the operation of the new law, for the obvious reason that very few Indian girls, if any at all, attain puberty in this presidency before they have completed the prescribed age. In Lower Bengal, however, the situation is altogether different, as we now learn from authoritative sources. For these reasons we think it would have been better if Dr. Pollen had not made a very pointed reference to the agitation in question. At any rate, we feel satisfied that there was no need for addressing to the audience any exhortation of the kind actually addressed by the Agent for Sardárs in the Deccan; for, it is not altogether improbable that, instead of producing the result aimed at, Dr. Pollen's pointed reference to the subject might lead to precisely the opposite results.

Meeting held at Bombay to adopt a memorial to Parliament against the Age of Consent Act.

16. In alluding to the meeting held on the 31st ultimo near the Victoria Gardens, Bombay, to adopt a petition for presentation to the House of Commons against the Age of Consent Act, the Jáme Jamshed (84), in its issue of the 2nd June, says:—The attendance at this meeting was not so large as it was at the Jhaverbág meeting, and this shows that the opposition to the Act has considerably subsided. Except a few Hindus and Mahomedans there is no chance of any Pársis, Christians, Israels and others putting their signatures to the memorial. It is gratifying that the intelligent portion of the opponents of the Act have seen that the objects of the measure are salutary, and have therefore prayed in the memorial that the punishment provided by the law for a person cohabiting with his wife under the age of 12 years is very heavy and ought to be lessened, and that no one except the girl-wife or her relations or guardians should be allowed to lay a complaint before the Magistrate. It is, however, not likely that the memorial will receive due attention from Parliament after such a lapse of time since the passing of the Act. The memorialists and persons of their opinion would do well to exert themselves to abolish infant marriages among themselves. [The Broach Samáchár (95) of the 4th June expresses similar sentiments.]

17. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 4th June, writes:—Last Sunday's meeting held near Byculla, Bombay, to protest against the Age of Consent Act was a good success and the organisers may be congratulated on the achievement of the one main feature—the union of Hindus and Mahomedans in the matter,—the chair being taken by Moulvi Hidáyatulla, formerly Turkish Consul. The meeting being convened to send up a formal protest to the House of Commons, the weapon of oratory was not largely indulged in, though Professor Jinsiwále made one or two good points in his otherwise long and humorous speech. A man of influence and position, Moulvi Hidáyatulla riveted the attention of the audience to the main purpose for which the meeting was called, and, as president, did justice to the functions that devolved upon him. This second protest meeting has been the subject of abuse and ridicule in some quarters, but none need feel aggrieved at this. As defenders of the Act everything under it may appear to the former rose-coloured and gay, though they will do well to remember that all that glitters is not gold. Some are pleased to call the meeting a meeting of the lower classes, but if men like Ráo Bahádur Nána Moroji, Messrs. A'pte, Garud and the presiding Moulvi, Kazi and other respectable people are to be ranked as low, we should like to be enlightened as to who form the higher class. By the way, we may tell these writers that these gentlemen occupy in their respective professions just the same positions that members of the Jhaverbág meeting did or do now. But perversity will never take a right view of the matter, and writers of the above stamp can be no exception to the above rule. But the greatest wonder is that, while Europeans are found to sympathise with our institutions, nay to warn us against too intimate an assimilation with European customs, some of our own people are found openly to say that, unless we are anglicised, there can be no hope of India's regeneration. For ourselves we would wish them joy of such a conviction, but would advise them in sober earnest not to be over-hasty in these matters. To some the present Act may appear a small matter, but it will be productive of difficulties which it will be then too late to repent. But whatever the future result, the free expression of dissent or protest can be no crime, despite the lucubrations of some supporters of the Act; and those who arranged the last Sunday's meeting were, therefore, well advised in getting up the protest. [A correspondent of the Kesari (42), in its issue of the 2nd June, observes that much importance should be given to this meeting, as the unity seen on this occasion between Hindus and Mahomedans was unprecedented.]

The leaders of the Hindu society who have received English education do not represent the opinion of the masses in religious matters.

18. Referring to the recent riot at Benares, the Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 4th June, says that the mistake usually committed by Government is that in dealing with religious matters of its subjects it relies on the representations of men educated in English, whose views on religious matters evidently entirely differ from those of the masses, and requests Government to correct the blunder committed by them in connection with the Age of Consent Act and to be good enough to avoid its repetition in future.

The Bombay East Indians and the Arms Act.

19. The Phœnix (5), in its issue of the 27th May, says:—It has been recently determined by the Government of India, as we learn, that those in the Bombay Presidency calling themselves Bombay East Indians are not entitled to the same privileges under the Indian Arms Act as Europeans and Eurasians, and, consequently, like the Hindus and Musalmans, will not be permitted to retain arms. Of course, it cannot be denied that the so-called Bombay East Indians are, after all, nothing but Native converts, and there is probably good sense in the Government resolution, inasmuch as it ignores all distinction between one class of Natives and another. But, if the Government is to be logical and consistent with itself, how is it that, while it debars Hindus and Musalmans from admittance into the volunteer corps, it allows access to East Indians? It certainly is in accordance with the letter and spirit of British rule not to make religion a ground of difference of treatment, and it is, in all probability, a matter of public policy that East Indians are forbidden to have arms in their possession. But if this principle is to be carried to its logical extent, why should they be allowed to retain a Martini-Henri rifle in their possession, which oftentimes affords facilities for their having several rounds of ammunition by them? The Government therefore, in stamping out a distinction, has done so at the risk of being illogical.

Protest against the rumoured appointment of Mr. W. Webb as Presidency Magistrate at Bombay.

20. The Rást Goftár (86), in its issue of the 31st May, writes:—The appointment of Mr. Webb as a Presidency Magistrate will be a huge job. His appointment as Chief Presidency Magistrate will be little short of a scandal. The entire Native press and public regard it as a provision made by Government for an individual without any regard to the public interests. Mr. Webb has acted more than once in place of Mr. Cooper, but we doubt whether he ever gave general satisfaction in the discharge of his duties. When the Government of Lord Reay passed over Mr. Webb and brought in Mr. Crawley-Boevey to act during Mr. Cooper's absence a hue and cry was raised by Mr. Webb's friends that a gross injustice had been done to him, that the Chief Presidency Magistrate required a man of local experience and knowledge of mercantile law and practice, that, in short, the public interests would be jeopardised if any one but Mr. Webb were appointed to the place. Mr. Webb had a powerful and influential circle of friends—the Bombay and the Byculla Clubs combined—so influential that they succeeded in getting signatures of some leading Natives to the memorial which they had sent to Government on behalf of their friend. Friendly partiality could go no further and do nothing more than was done for Mr. Webb. But Lord Reay was resolute and a stinging admonition was administered to the memorialists. It could be plainly seen through the sarcasm of the reply that Government had no difficulty in discovering that the motive of the memorialists was anything but the public good. But the men who constitute the Government change periodically. Mr. Webb knew the virtue of waiting. It was a virtue of necessity. He waited till the death or departure of those who knew him better, and his patience has now at last been rewarded. He is appointed for the present in place of Mr. Richardson, who is sent back to the districts, and in the fulness of time Mr. Webb, who has done nothing either as a barrister or as Magistrate to deserve it, will occupy the responsible and lucrative post of Chief Presidency Magistrate. Query: Why is Mr. Richardson sent back to the mofussil? He was not a great acquisition to the magisterial bench, and, therefore, his retirement will cause little regret. But Mr. Webb is by no means a good substitute for King Log. It had long been the practice, and the practice had almost risen to the dignity of a legal provision, that one of the Magistrates should be a Native. Now all three of them are Europeans. [The Kaiser-i-Hind (85) and the Subodh Patrika (16) of the same date, and the Indu Prakásh (13) of the 1st June, disapprove of the appointment of Mr. Webb.]

Mr. Crawley-Boevey as Collector of Dhárwár.

21. The Karnátak Patrá (133), in its issue of the 1st June, says:—We have already noticed in our last that Mr. Crawley-Boevey, the Collector of Dhárwar, has gone on leave of absence to England. During the period of nearly two years that Mr. Crawley-Boevey was Collector of Dhárwár he worked like an ordinary man. He showed no signs of genius, nor was he a strong man, nor did he seem to wish to leave his name behind. Anyhow he pulled on smoothly with his work. He had, however, the wisdom not to act on hearsay or not to be guided by others, and did what he thought right. Sometimes he committed mistakes on account of his temper being rather hasty. He, however, never treated his subordinates badly.

Remarks on Mr. Wiltshire, First Assistant Collector, Dhárwár.

22. The same newspaper says:—We learn that Mr. Wiltshire, First Assistant Collector, Dhárwár, is transferred to Poona. He was in our midst for a period of about fifteen years. Even ordinary intelligence and ordinary ways of thinking were not found in him. The Karnátak Vártik once stated that when he came to Dhárwár he was not able to write correctly even a few lines in his own mother tongue. It is said that he has risen in the service on account of the influence of his relatives, who are big officials in Government service. Dhárwár is said to be a fit place for useless officials, but we are glad to say that latterly Mr. Wiltshire did his work smoothly.

Complaints in connection with the revised settlement of the village of Vátad in the Ratnágiri Táluka.

23. The Bakul (21), in its issue of the 31st May, says:—Several complaints have reached us in connection with the classification of lands in the village of Vátad in the Ratnágiri Táluka at the last revised settlement. The complainants allege that the lands which were held by them as dhára lands for the last one hundred years or more have been now classed as khoti, and that though special assessment has been imposed in this village for the first time the landholders have not been informed of their rights in their lands and of other particulars connected therewith. The attention of the District Settlement Officer is requested to these complaints.

A complaint that full water rates are levied without supplying water from the canals during the hot season.

24. A correspondent, writing from Dhulia to the Indu Prakásh (13) in its issue of the 1st June, says:—The cultivation of garden lands has been undertaken by people at a considerable outlay of capital, but the garden crops heavily suffer from want of water in the hot season, which ought to be supplied to them from the canals. And yet full water rates are levied on these lands under the interpretation that Government are not bound to supply water throughout the year. The people ought to think twice before investing their money in Government promissory notes, as Government interpret their laws as it suits their purpose best.

"An open letter" to His Excellency Lord Harris in connection with the Rájábái Tower tragedy, severely censuring the police of Bombay.

25. In "an open letter" to His Excellency Lord Harris in connection with the Rájábái Tower tragedy, the Kaiser-i-Hind (85), in its issue of the 31st May, says:—That malign ulcers of a most virulent and bleeding type are discernible at this juncture in the Bombay Police goes without saying—the police, which is legally supposed to protect the life and liberty of our citizens, especially of our mothers and sisters, our wives and daughters, is, we are bound to say, practically doing absolutely nothing towards that object. The appalling fatality which occurred in front of the sacred portals of the Rájábái Tower five weeks ago, has spread consternation in the whole community of Bombay, which, it is deplorable to have to state, the police has done nothing to allay. The attitude and conduct of the police which has been engaged in tracking out this foulest and most nefarious of human crimes, are even more amazing and beyond comprehension. Nay, more. Your Lordship could not have failed to infer from the voluminous published proceedings of the Coroner's inquest which has now extended over 18 days, that that body has been behaving in a way which is not only extraordinary but most suspicious. From first to last it has built a frail pyramid of preposterous presumptions which no man of ordinary common sense cares to believe. Instead of responding to public opinion, which is more than satisfied that the unhappy girls were first outraged and then thrown down by a set of infamous and bloody villains, it has gone on on its own hook, fanatically persevering in its own fancied but utterly unfounded theory of accident, and done everything in its power to produce evidence which, on the face of it, is so unreliable, so conflicting, and so sophisticated that even the meanest intelligence would contemptuously refuse to pin its faith to it for a second. In fact, it would be no exaggeration to say that the theory started by the police is the theory evolved from its own inner consciousness. Whatever may have been the misgivings and the scepticism about the outrage theory at the beginning, the absolutely correct version of the three Pársi children and the sepoy Arjun,—reliable witnesses who have manfully stood the cross-examination of the intimidating and insolent police,—has left no doubt on the mind of unbiassed persons in Bombay about the correctness of that theory. It was its bounden duty to have carried on the investigation on that hypothesis, but it has studiously and on purpose—which to us appears to be extremely suspicious—avoided it. On the contrary, there is now ample evidence in the proceedings to justify the public belief that the police has made a dead set not to find out crime at all hazards. Look over, my Lord, at the examination of the Coroner's Surgeon. What was it but a tissue of fancied hypotheses, a fine cobweb-like spinning of palpable fantasies, a mass of gross self-delusions—in short, a very congerie of mare's nests as to the injuries on the bodies of the deceased ladies having been the effect of the fall! That absurd and irrational theory, utterly uncorroborated by facts or medical experience as Your Lordship must have perceived, has been entirely cut up to pieces by the scientific scalpel of "B.," the able correspondent of the Bombay Gazette. Finding that this fata morgana of the Coroner's Surgeon—this medical flapdoodle, all wind and dust,—was discounted, it had no other recourse left but to find fault with the evidence submitted by the prosecution. Mark, my Lord, that for well nigh two weeks it raved, ranted, gadded and beat about the bush to construct some kind of structure in support of its hypothesis. It brought scores of witnesses, who proved next to nothing and the veracity of many of whom is open to grave doubt. But the moment little Nawázbái and her comrades, along with Arjun, ruthlessly tore the veil in which the mystery was enshrouded and unmasked the real state of facts, it changed its tactics. If it egregiously failed, owing to its incompetency or to something else which it would be for Your Lordship thoroughly to investigate, to trace the crime, it was expected that after the exposure made by the prosecution it would have at least abandoned its preconceived notions, cast aside its prejudices, and honestly striven, with the thread of the narrative, to unwind the maze and bring forward the culprits. But what has it done? Is it necessary to inform Your Lordship that it has perversely and on purpose tried to sit with folded hands and do nothing? Nay more, that it has shown most culpable neglect to investigate further evidence in the right and straightforward spirit which the public had the right to expect under the circumstances. Whatever may be the truth or untruth regarding the bundle which is alleged to give a complete proof of the criminality of the suspect Asláji and his accomplices,—two rich Mahomedans whose names, we repeat, are in everybody's mouth,—it may be reasonably asked why did the Commissioner fail personally to inquire into the matter? Is a Commissioner supposed to sit at his desk under such circumstances or to be so fully alive to his responsibilities as to personally exert himself in detecting crime? Was that the way Mr. Forjett, the predecessor of Sir Frank Souter, managed to bring home the intention of two infantry soldiers to raise a mutiny in Bombay? Did he not personally venture to discover it? And did he or did he not strive his best to capture the miscreants. Again, did he not create a spirit of honour and virtue among his reorganised police and make it respected and confided by the people? But what did the Commissioner do in this instance? Was it not his duty to have personally satisfied himself as to the truth or untruth of the matter by going in company with his informer without delay to the place where it was supposed to have been secreted? What are Commissioners made and paid for? Are they paid to sit in their arm-chairs and write long reports, true or untrue, on information which their subordinates may bring to them? If we are to have lady Commissioners in kidgloves and shawls and bangles, the sooner Bombay gets rid of such the better. And what are we to say of the extraordinary dereliction of duty on the part of that Police Superintendent who is alleged to have been ordered by the Commissioner to search the bundle? Was it not most suspicious and extraordinary to have slept over the affair for 56 hours under some plausible pretext or another, with the result that the evidence evaporated itself? And yet, with an inconsistency which is as astounding as it is audacious, the police had the hardihood to question poor wights of witnesses who either offered themselves voluntarily or were offered by Mr. Craigie, why each of them respectively failed to give immediate information within their personal experience? Thus, what was considered sauce for the ganders of timid witnesses was no sauce for the immaculate geese of the police! Look again, Your Lordship, at the character of the latest evidence adduced by the police last week. Can it be said that it was produced with the object of finding out the clue? Or was it with the apparent motive of throwing doubts on the truthful evidence of the children and Arjun? Analyse and examine, if you please, the conduct and attitude of the police from every point of view, and you cannot but come to these irresistible conclusions: (1) That either it is an incapable body and entirely effete to detect grave crime, or (2) that it refuses to discover it on purpose from motives which it is not possible to fathom, but which could not be conceived to be in the public interests. The inquest, after dragging its slow length, is now concluded. But is it possible to conceive that the guilty rascals have been brought to answer for their villainy? Neither is it possible that with such a police as has now the charge of the case the perpetrators of the heinous offence could ever be brought to book. Under the circumstances, is it unnatural if the entire public look forward to Your Lordship to allay public suspicion and set at rest the doubts that still seem to hang over it? We are not, my Lord, one of those, as Burke says, who think that the people are never in the wrong. But we do say that, where there is a divergence of opinion on matters like these, the presumption at least is in favour of the popular theory. There is absolutely no mystery now left to be unfolded. The plot is now disclosed. One of the actors is known publicly. The other actors are not less known. It only remains, therefore, for Your Lordship to order the investigation at this stage to be entrusted to other less defiant and more trusty hands, if like the public you are anxious (of which we have not the slightest doubt) to have the perpetrators of this foul deed tracked to their home and brought to the bar of justice. Bombay earnestly expects, therefore, my Lord, that at this alarming juncture, when the minds of law-abiding men and women have been unhinged, for they cannot say what may happen to some of their own families to-morrow if this police inquiry is to end in a barren and most disappointing result—you will look into this grave matter narrowly and closely. The public, who are keenly alive to it, cannot allow the matter to terminate inconclusively—a matter which, it may be repeated, is creating a great public scandal which cannot but leave a stigma of the dirtiest and inkiest hue on Your Lordship's administration. It cannot be that your Government can look on with stolid and passive indifference to an occurrence which possibly may blast its reputation on the rock of Imbecility. Justice and vengeance never cried so loud in Bombay as they have cried on this occasion. As the head of the State, you are, my Lord, the visible embodiment of Justice, and on you and you alone devolves the grave duty of wreaking vengeance on the perpetrators of that unholy crime which has shocked and shivered Bombay, and at the same time of performing a lustration of the present demoralised police of the city.

Alleged negligence of the Bombay Police to inquire into the story about the bundle of clothes in connection with the Rájábái Tower tragedy.

26. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 31st May, writes:—In connection with the Rájábái Tower affair, a certain bundle has been much talked of during the week. We assume our readers to be in possession of the facts about it. A bundle, supposed to consist of a number of more or less torn shirts, &c., with some money, was reported to be in the possession of a Márwádi. The Pársi gentleman to whom this important piece of information is brought consults Mr. Craigie, and following his advice communicates the information to Colonel Wilson. The police inquire of the Márwádi more than fifty-six hours after the information is given. The Márwádi denies all knowledge of it, does not even know the Mahomedan, &c., &c. The police, the newspapers and their correspondents draw their own conclusions from the facts that have transpired. The really material question is, knowing as the Police Commissioner did too well the extreme importance of an immediate investigation, why did he allow fifty-six hours to elapse before commencing it? There is most culpable negligence, and the public should like to know whose it is. The blame primarily rests with the Police Commissioner, and it is his duty to explain the delay, to explain whether it was he who gave orders so late, or it was his subordinates who made the delay in carrying out the order. From his information he should have known that the successful tracing of a murderer depended on the result of the investigation. He should have, therefore, lost no time in making the necessary inquiry. Even if he did not believe at all in a murder, he should have been equally anxious to lose no time, as any delay that he made would be an argument, in the hands of those who believed in a murder, that the evidence to prove it to be a murder was allowed to be done away with by the police. A Police Commissioner, in fact, should know the full importance in such a case of immediate action, and he should explain why it was not taken. In this case the witnesses who have to give evidence to the effect that there was violence used are afraid of the police, and those who depose to the contrary are always favoured by them. Can any one explain why? Supposing that the Pársi gentleman had seen or secured the bundle, could not the all-powerful police have done something or other—the police which has already done so much that it should not have, and has not done so much that it should have—to prove that the bundle never belonged to its owner, or that the police found its contents very different? The police account always varies materially from the account given by independent witnesses. And why could it not differ in this one more particular? It is a pity that such a serious case should be made a matter of theories and party spirit, for no other meaning can attach to the defiance with which the police set aside the voice of the people or refuse to follow up any clue given by disinterested men. Is it not time that Government contemplated interference, removed the police officers who are found to work with prejudice, and entrusted the inquiry to officers having a right conception of their duty and eager to work in the interest of truth and justice? There was no need of producing Mr. Kápadia against Aaláji, whose statement as to the former pointing him out to the children was on the face of it a piece of abject chicanery. If the police were informed of it, they committed a gross neglect in the discharge of their duties by not informing the Coroner that very day. The same may be said regarding the mysterious disappearance of the packet of clothes, which would have thrown any light on the case and for which information was given to the police. Why did the police, instead of starting on inquiry at once, delay for full fifty-six hours, as the Advocate of India so soundly reasons? The plea that the information did not come from a reliable source will hardly hold when the public see that the police made use of witnesses more suspicious than the informant in this case. It is no use keeping silent over the fact that the confidence of the public in the police is much shaken, and it will be some time before that confidence is restored. The disappearance of the packet as well as of a witness in connection with it has made matters worse. [The Hindi Punch (104) of the same date and the Broach Samáchár (95) of 4th June also condemn the conduct of the police.]

27. The Kaiser-i-Hind (85), in its issue of the 31st May, writes:—In the evidence submitted by Mr. Craigie there is ample material to put together the principal links of the chain of the whole nefarious plot which eventually culminated in the untimely death of two innocent girls. And on Friday last another veil was uplifted by a quiet gentleman, who stoutly averred that Asláji confessed to him in the presence of Mr. McDermott that two Mahomedans had a struggle with the ladies while he was present there! Of course, Mr. McDermott contradicted the statement, but the shrewd public well know which evidence was more credible. Mr. Enty did not keep the information to himself, but gave it out to four highly respectable gentlemen, two of whom are well known members of the bar. Mr. Enty's is, indeed, a startling revelation, more startling in its simplicity and accuracy than even the simple and truthful narrative of Nawázbái. So here is fresh weighty testimony to sustain the original theory of outrage and the allegation against Asláji and his accomplices. To our mind, it is now irresistibly clear that Asláji, in order to ward off any kind of suspicion against himself, had tried, like the thief in the Persian fable, to blurt out the truth. He himself was the author of the statement which went up like wildfire within an hour of the fatality that a Pársi and two Mahomedans were the offenders. Now, with all these facts before us, is it premature yet to say that the mystery is almost cleared up? What is there to prevent the Coroner from ordering the arrest of Asláji? And why should not A'tmárám be also arrested and turned into 'Queen's evidence'? We are convinced that he knows the whole truth, but is, perhaps, under such mortal dread of the police that he is prevented from divulging the entire secret of the tower imbroglio. Let also the two suspected Mahomedans be put under arrest. And will the police endeavour to trace the whereabouts of the clerk of Mr. Chitnis who is reported to have gone away somewhere? We repeat, the plot is now fully disclosed, and it only remains for the police at even this late hour to bring the charge home to each and every offender implicated in the crime, if it at all cares for its reputation. Will it do so? It remains to be seen. [The Gujarátí (81), in its issue of the 31st May, expresses similar sentiments.]

The Rájábái Tower tragedy, the conduct of the police of Bombay, and the verdict of the Coroner's jury.

28. The Bombay Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 1st June, observes:—The evidence latterly recorded before the Coroner has been sufficient to show that the Rájábái Tower tragedy was the result of an outrage attempted upon the deceased Bachubái and Perozbái. The answers given by Superintendent McDermott to questions put to him by the Coroner show that the Superintendent arrived, long before the post mortem examination of the deceased by the Coroner's Surgeon, at the conclusion that the fatality was caused by accident. This was evidently quite wrong on the part of that officer and the same ought to be duly noticed by Government. ——The same, in its issue of the 4th June, expresses much satisfaction with the verdict of the Coroner's jury in the case of the deaths of Bachubái and Perozbái, the verdict charging Mánakji Asláji, with two unknown persons, with culpable homicide not amounting to murder in regard to the death of Bachubái, and Mánakji alone with culpable homicide amounting to murder with reference to the death of Perozbái, and observes with much pleasure that the Coroner in summing up the evidence expressed an opinion discarding the theories of accident and suicide, and directing the attention of the jury to the theory of outrage and murder. [The Jáme Jamshed (94), in its several issues of this week, expresses similar sentiments.]

29. The O Portugues Britannico (158), in its issue of the 30th May, writes :—The Coroner's inquest on the death of the two Pársi girls, Perozbái and Bachubái, is still dragging its weary length without as yet coming any nearer to elucidating the mystery in which the whole affair is involved than when it first began. There is no doubt that the evidence given by the Pársi children brought forward by Mr. Craigie gives a good colouring to the theory of outrage, but the principal effect of that evidence will be to create an impression in the mind of the public that Pársi children are far more clever than they are recognized to be, and that they only need to be taken in hand to transform themselves into prodigies. The petite Nawázbái, who is only 11 years old, was simply wonderful. She had seen all and heard all, and was able to give the Coroner a circumstantial account of the whole thing, giving each particular circumstance its due place in the order of time. She was exact to the second and scrupulous to the minutest details, so much so that she was able to differentiate between an occurrence while the bells were chiming and another while the bells were still vibrating after the chiming. She was altogether a most precious witness. The report about the Mahomedan and the bundle of clothes, which has been most sedulously circulated among the Pársis, is another beautiful cloak for heaping abuses on the police. How much the story is worth will be seen from a letter signed "Scrutiny" published in the Bombay Gazette of yesterday. It is only necessary to point out that "Scrutiny," as he himself declares, is one of those who believe that the Rájábái Tower case is one of attempted outrage, and therefore a writer who is not likely to underrate such evidence as it is understood the bundle of clothes would give. The Coroner's inquest is still going on, and the police are on their trial. We hope that both the Coroner and the police will soon be relieved.

Remarks on the evidence of the Pársi children in the Rájábái Tower tragedy case.

30. The Káseide Mumbai (108), in its issue of the 3rd June, gives the report that the whole Khoja community has been much agitated by the names of two of their number being widely rumoured in connection with the tower tragedy, that a preliminary meeting of the Khojás was held for a consideration of this grave scandal, and that it was resolved to hold a public meeting to contradict this rumour. The Káseid observes that if two Khojás are really implicated in the crime, their names should be at once published by the Pársis.

The Rájábái Tower tragedy and the Khoja community.

31. A correspondent of the Jáme Jamshed (84), in its issue of the 6th June, asks why does not the police in India adopt the practice, said to be followed by the police in Europe, of taking the photograph of the person murdered in order to detect the murderer when he could not otherwise be found, as it is said that the photograph of the latter is found impressed on the retina of the eye of the victim, and observes that had this practice been followed in India the solution of the present mystery about the Rájábái Tower fatality and the detection of murderers in several other cases would have been vastly facilitated.

Recommendation to the police in India to adopt the practice said to be followed in Europe of taking photographs of murdered persons in order to discover the murderers when they could not otherwise be detected.

32. The Pársi Tihdhár (114), in its issue of the 1st June, has heard a rumour that a Pársi gentleman and his wife, while recently enjoying themselves one moonlight night on the maidán at Bombay, were outraged by about four European soldiers, but the police did not render the pair any assistance, and requests the authorities to inquire into this rumour.

An outrage alleged to have been committed on a Pársi and his wife at Bombay.

33. A correspondent of the Praja Mat (115), in its issue of the 30th May, complains that the road from the railway station to the town of Sánand, in the Ahmedabad District, has fallen into disrepair since its inspection and repairs have been transferred to the Engineering Department, and requests that the road should be repaired at once.

PART II.—Municipalities.

34. The Dnyán Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 4th June, writes :—Dr. Pollen in his speech at the recent annual Darbár held at Poona referred to the local self-government question, using the expression in its broadest sense, and conveyed to his audience the most gratifying assurance that His Excellency Lord Harris, the present Governor of Bombay, took a keen interest in the question, and that His Lordship would be pleased to see its successful development. The passage in which Dr. Pollen communicated to his audience this most gratifying assurance is too important to be ignored. The principal reason why we consider the assurance conveyed by Dr. Pollen as most gratifying, —it may be even described as a message of peace and good will—is that, rightly or wrongly, the controversy between the Bombay Government and the Poona Municipality, which has been going on during the last twelve months or thereabouts (a period synchronous with the commencement of His Lordship's régime), has come to be regarded as a change of attitude on the part of the Bombay Government towards the local self-government policy in general. Any vague impression that may have existed on the subject during the last twelve months has received additional support from the line of argument adopted, and also from the disposition disclosed in Mr. Secretary Nugent's letter to the President of the Poona City Municipality, dated the 11th ultimo, to judge the Poona city municipal administration during the last five years, especially by a standard altogether different from that which was used in judging the preceding official administration. The open and undisguised avowal of such a disposition on the part of the local Government, while in one sense it is to be greatly regretted, is, in another sense, to be greatly welcomed as an open declaration by the authority, which professes to sit in judgment, of its bias and deeply-rooted prejudices. That declaration deserves to be welcomed further on the additional ground that it amounts to an unqualified admission that if Poona city municipal administration is judged by the same standard of efficiency which used to be applied before the commencement of 1886—at any rate before July 1883—it must be declared to have been eminently successful on the whole. His Lordship will have also found by this time that local self-government in Poona is certainly not a sham, even though it may not be a reality in its most perfect and developed form. We fully endorse the appeal made by Dr. Pollen on behalf of His Excellency the Governor to the landed aristocracy for their active co-operation and support in this connection both by their example and influence. "You can," said Dr. Pollen, "come forward as candidates for election yourselves, or you can promote and influence the return of the best and most competent candidates." In the interest of the representatives of the landed aristocracy the advice is excellent, and we trust it will stimulate them to put forward their energy and strength in the promotion of public weal. It is also suspected in some quarters that under the guise of the forementioned advice is contained an insinuation to the effect that there are some undesirable members on the Poona City Municipality. If there be any such members and if they have any sense of self-respect left in them, they would do well to take warning in time and avert a slur being cast over the whole body for the sins of a few. It is evident from the resolution issued by Lord Reay's Government in March 1889 on the Poona municipal elections that, in their opinion there were some members, among those who got elected, who had obtained their seats through corrupt practices. And owing to the failure of the local municipality in challenging a public inquiry into the circumstances connected with the allegations, the impression has doubtless received an additional strength during the interval. It is an open secret that in official circles this phase of the question is openly talked of, and, if we are not altogether misinformed, even individual names are openly mentioned as those of the objectionable persons on the board of the local municipality. Seeing that the next triennial elections will be held before the next annual Darbár comes on, the pointed appeal made to the landed aristocracy may not be without its significance. Be that as it may, the electors of Poona will have an opportunity early next year of profiting by the warning, if there should really be any valid grounds for it.

The assurance given by Dr. Pollen about the keen interest taken by His Excellency Lord Harris in local self-government at Poona considered very gratifying.

35. The Indu Prakash (13), in its issue of the 1st June, writes:—The treatment which the Government is giving to the municipality of Poona is hardly fair. The Government framed a certain set of charges against the municipality and the latter answered them. The Government, instead of either substantiating the charges or making amends to the municipality by admitting its error, now frames a new set of charges. We fancy the municipality, in its turn, will answer these, but at this rate this correspondence will be endless. If the Government is not satisfied with the working of the municipality, let it lay down specific particulars in which it wants improvement. But this condemnation piecemeal is very objectionable. The present proceeding looks like that of the wolf in the fable. The municipality is charged with having failed to do with regard to sanitation and drainage all that it ought to have done. The municipality may not, and probably does not, claim to be the best of all municipalities. The question is whether certain charges of remissness which were framed against it are true. If they are not true, the municipality should be absolved from the censure that has been passed upon it.

Remarks on the charges brought by the Bombay Government against the Poona Municipality.

36. Referring to the same subject the Dnyan Prakash (12), in its issue of the 1st June, writes:—We are surprised that the Bombay Government should have failed to perceive the utter groundlessness of the complaint, so far as the drainage works in the town of Poona are concerned. In the first place, from 1880 to the end of 1885—or, to be more accurate, to the end of January 1886—the Collector of Poona was ex officio President of the Poona City Municipality, assisted by a large proportion of ex officio and nominated members. Will the Bombay Government undertake to explain why during that period of six years nothing was done to push on the drainage works? Moreover, is it not within the recollection of the Government that Mr. Arthur Crawford's Sanitary Committee, appointed by Government Resolution in the General Department, No. 1207, dated the 2nd April 1886, practically gave judgment against the adoption by the municipality of Colonel Ducat's underground drainage scheme, and that the Government in their resolution in the General Department, No. 3662, dated the 6th December 1887, endorsed that judgment? It will not be out of place if the Bombay Government is reminded here that even before the appointment of the Sanitary Committee in April 1886 Colonel Ducat's scheme was found fault with and condemned as impracticable more or less on similar grounds both by Colonel Greig, the then Superintending Engineer, C. D., and by Mr. Robertson, the then Commissioner, C.D. After giving a brief summary of the official correspondence on the subject of the Poona City drainage scheme, the paper remarks:—We trust it will be readily admitted by every impartial critic that the complaint of Government, that eleven years since 1880 have been wasted by the municipality, is absolutely groundless. As a result of the orders passed by Government in December 1887, it may be regarded that until the commencement of 1890 no drainage scheme was before the municipality, and that the period for which the municipality may have to account for varies from twelve to fifteen months. We are inclined to think that few persons will consider the aforesaid period to be an unreasonably long period for the municipality to come to a decision on such an important question as the drainage of the city, with which is indissolubly connected the question of the drainage of the cantonment suburbs. And we shall not be surprised if the Bombay Government took a much longer period to arrive at a decision on the much vexed question. That we are not merely speculating in entertaining such a belief will be clearly evident from the fact that although it is now nearly a year since another project prepared by Mr. Bhat (i.e., the project for the city filter works) was submitted to Government for approval in pursuance of the orders contained in the resolutions of December 1887 and January 1888, the municipality has not yet heard from Government. It is not a complicated project like that for the surface drainage of the city, and it is astonishing, to say the least, that a project prepared by a competent officer under the supervision of his departmental official superiors should have been as yet left undisposed of by the Bombay Government. And this is the way in which an example of "prompt action, energetic administration and speedy execution of important public works" is set by the Bombay Government for the edification of the Poona City Municipality! Can a more scandalous instance of "deliberation, discussion and delay" than the one given above be imagined? "Physician, cure thyself," is the reply which one may be tempted to address to the Bombay Government.

37. The Mahratta (4), in its issue of the 31st May, writes:—The Poona Municipality is once more the subject of public criticism, but this time, we are glad to find, the tide of public opinion is rather in favour of than against it. Government themselves have considerably mitigated the rigour of their judgment, and although they are not yet prepared to be quite just, they have at least ceased to be entirely unjust. A little more perseverance on the part of the municipality will, we hope, induce them to do justice, and then opportunities will not be wanting to give and take. Their resolution of 11th instant is, we think, very suggestive, and the municipal commissioners would certainly be entitled to be called shrewd negotiators if they took up the gentle hint thrown out. Government wants the municipality to show that compared to itself it is progressing. That done, the whole controversy will be soon settled. For ourselves, we sincerely thank Government for suggesting this way out, and we strongly recommend to the municipal commissioners the necessity of modifying their policy a little. We give the commissioners full credit for the noble stand they have throughout taken, but, at the same time, we say to them that they must realize the difficulties of Government. Under the guidance of their representative Government went along; but at a particular stage their progress was most effectively arrested, and they found to their greatest surprise that their guide had misguided them. They would have been very glad, indeed, to make a confession of their honest error, if that could have been decently achieved. They knew that a sudden retreat was neither safe nor possible, and they decided upon retracing their steps consistently with their prestige and their policy. Each resolution that leaves the Secretariat is a decided advance towards the starting point, and by the time all accounts are squared the present Government will, we have every reason to hope, be as ready to do justice to the municipality as that of Lord Reay. The resolution of 11th May under review is an earnest of this policy, and it would be most unfortunate if the municipality should misread the signs of the times. The resolution is a clear confession of the fact that the municipality is in the right and the Government in the wrong. Or else, how could it be that Government should so considerably modify their attack on the "weak and inferior staff" as to point out only to the smallness of the pay of the Health Officer and say nothing about the absence of an energetic and responsible executive head? The representation of the municipality dated 10th January 1891 was admittedly weak on this point, and we should have been surprised if Government had not discovered this weak point. They have done it, and it is now for the municipality to show that they have a strong case here also. Dr. Sánglay has not been long amongst us to justify us in pronouncing upon his capabilities as an administrator of a large staff of Bhangis and sweepers. But we need not hesitate to say that his educational qualifications are very high, and the municipality need not now point out the abilities of one of their members to be able to make up the defect in their sanitary establishment. The present small salary has attracted and is enough to retain a graduate of the Edinburgh University for at least three years, if not more, and this in itself is conclusive evidence of the incorrectness of the assertion in the Government resolution. Moreover, it may be mentioned that out of the four Health Officers that came to serve the municipality none left service because of the smallness of the pay of the post. In short, if these facts are properly placed before Government, we feel sure that they would, as honest critics, withdraw their objection on this head. From the question of the staff we come to that of the work done by it. Having given up their contention about the weakness and inefficacy of the staff Government could not speak about its work, and the resolution very naturally speaks of the work of the municipality. The language in which this work is criticised does not suffer from the fault of severity, and the resolution, therefore, cannot be found fault with on that ground. The resolution has that vagueness about it which characterises such documents. Vagueness of language in such documents gives an unmistakable insight into the strength or weakness of the position of Government, and those who are accustomed to read such documents say, in the present instance Government have pleaded their inability to trace vulnerable places in municipal administration. No doubt, they speak of procrastination and delay; but a feeling of conscious lameness can be detected about the remarks. Government observe that deliberation, discussion and delay rather than prompt action, energetic administration and speedy execution of important public works characterise the proceedings. We are not prepared entirely to contest the accuracy of these observations; but it may well be asked if this deliberation, discussion and delay are not preferable to the impatience, rashness and misguided zeal often displayed by a municipality under the guidance of the Collector-President. We know that it was promptness of action which constructed filters near the canal which by the resolution of the board were to be constructed for the Kátraj water. It was this impatience which widened the Sadáshiv Peth road and laid waste the Shukrawár gardens, to the discontentment and annoyance of many thousand inhabitants. It was misguided zeal that levied illegal duties and involved the municipality in pecuniary loss. In the representation to which the resolution under review is a reply the municipality says that the work done in one year did not fit in with the work proposed to be done in another year, and there are instances on record in which the work of a previous year had to be undone and the whole commenced de novo. But we must cut this sort of criticism short. Government do not like comparisons with work done before 1883. Two instances are referred to as evidence of the dilatory habits of the corporation, viz., drainage and slaughter-house. In pointing out these instances the Secretariat officials write without knowledge of previous correspondence. In these two instances the dilatoriness is traceable more to the doors of Government than to those of the municipality. The question of having underground drains came before the first meeting of the municipality in 1883 and the hollowness of the arguments used in favour of having a new project was at once exposed. It was proved to the satisfaction of Government and all parties concerned that, cholera and other epidemics that visited the Poona City were the direct result of the action of Government in the Revenue and Irrigation Departments; and Government was compelled to admit the truth of Ráo Sáheb Námjoshi's propositions. Sugarcane cultivation roundabout the city was stopped, and it was decided to make the canal staunch and close the water-channels,—both most powerful sources of dampness in the city. That Government has been inactive, and culpably so, can be seen by anybody. And yet Government does not scruple to find fault with the municipality for dilatoriness. This is the same policy of justice, equity and common sense which would appoint commissions to inquire into the mal-administration of Native States, but would take no notice of oppression under its own roof. In this matter of drainage and slaughter-house constructions Government would want the municipality to say that they have done all they could, and they would be prepared to give credit to the body as they have done in the matter of surface drains. Now, as to the comparison of the municipality of 1883 with that of 1890 we shall produce facts. We shall take the matter of privies first. It appears that during the seven years of the new municipality 1,801 privies were improved. The number of improved privies is increasing every year:—

„	1885-86	„ 126
„	1886-87	„ 152
„	1887-88	„ 246
„	1888-89	„ 173
„	1889-90	„ 330

It will thus appear that with the exception of one year the number of privies improved is increasing, and that compared with the first year the number is three times as large in the last year of the series. If all improvements cannot be carried out in a day or even in a year, can we say that there is no reasonable progress in this direction? Improvement of privies has another side to it, viz., that of keeping them clean. Here the same progress is to be marked. We give below the quantity of night-soil removed during each of the seven years commencing with 1883 :—

1884	...	...	...	8,264	„ „
1885	...	...	...	8,451	„ „

1887	...	...	...	8,562	„ „
1888	...	...	...	9,046	„ „
1889	...	...	...	9,523	„ „
1890*	...	...	...	9,147	„ „

*Ten months.

These figures will speak for themselves. The municipality mentions that one of the results of such work during several years has been that, whereas the city was visited before with epidemic cholera almost every alternate year, there has been no epidemic cholera during the last four years. This is the result of bad sanitary administration. And what is the result of prompt Government action? Fever on the increase on account of increasing dampness due to leakage from the canal and water-channels. Let the public now judge. In conclusion, we ask the reader not to be deluded into believing that drainage would remove dampness. It will not. To remove dampness the canal must be made staunch and the water-channels stopped, which Government has not done and would not do. Who then is to blame—the municipality or the Government? [The Shri Shivdji (63) of the 29th and the Subodh Patrika (16) of the 31st May, and the Kesari (42) of the 2nd June, express similar sentiments.]

Remission of the outstanding due by the Dhárwár Municipality to the Bombay Government on account of water-works recommended.

38. The Dhárwár Vritt (30), in its issue of the 4th June, refers to the reply given by His Excellency Lord Harris to the address presented to His Lordship by the Dhárwár Municipality at his recent visit to that town, and remarks that the plans and estimates of the water-works at that city were actually prepared by an Engineer of the Public Works Department and examined by his departmental superiors, and ultimately passed by Government, notwithstanding that His Excellency has asserted to the contrary, and that, if not for this reason, on account of the failure of the scheme and the low financial condition of the municipality Government should remit the remaining debt due by it to Government.

Disapproval of the grant of Rs. 20 by the Tásgaon Municipality for assisting the local police in their work.

39. The Chandánshu (24) of Tásgaon, in its issue of the 31st May, disapproves of the grant of Rs. 20 for one year made by the local municipality for providing the police of the town with hand lanterns, &c., to take with them on their beats at night, and requests Government to refuse to take it as the acceptance of it would be against its own order previously issued.

Part III.—Native States.

The treatment at present accorded to Native Princes in India by the British Government disapproved and a change recommended.

40. The Mahárashtra Mitra (45), in its issue of the 28th May, disapproves of the treatment accorded by the British Government to the Native Chiefs and Princes in India, observing that if Government wish to preserve Native States intact they should allow the Chiefs and Princes free interchange of thoughts among themselves and remove restraints in the matter of adoption and maintenance of armies. The present policy of the British Government, adds the paper, shows their want of confidence in the loyalty of the Native Princes, and a change in the direction suggested above is sure to improve the administration of Native States and to raise the British Government in their esteem—things which will ultimately be very beneficial to British rule in India.

The English press on the Manipur disaster.

41. The Mahratta (4), in its issue of the 31st May, writes:—Now that the Senápati has been caught and the work of wreaking justice on the murderers of Mr. Quinton and others is progressing apace, the question of the future of Manipur becomes pressing. Government has for the time being assumed all the sovereignty there. But should Manipur be annexed? That is the question which everybody is discussing. We cannot have knowledge of all the circumstances of the case, but, so far as we can judge from the papers published, we are led to think that it would be unjust to annex the State. What ground is there for annexation? Surely, not the massacre. That was the result of the foolish policy and unworthy stratagem which Mr. Quinton pursued and wanted to use and to which the Government of India gave its sanction. Moreover, the murderers will be tried and punished. How does the ex-Mahárája, who was not concerned in any way with the massacre and who has been knocking at the door of the Governor General and Viceroy for help, forfeit his rights to the throne? The late Resident of Manipur has been fighting in the columns of the London Times right manfully against the suggestion to annex the State. Lord Ripon, too, has given his opinion against annexation. Here are His Lordship's words: "Lord Canning's policy has given to India nearly forty years of internal peace; it has secured the loyalty of the Native Princes, and it concerns the honour of this country that it should be maintained. A reversal of that policy would alarm the head of every State from one end of India to the other, and I would not guarantee the tranquillity of our Indian Empire for five years, after so fatal a course was adopted." How true and weighty these words are! The publication of the papers has done His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's Government a bad turn. The World, a Conservative journal, and, as the London correspondent of the Hindu says, "as stout a supporter as British officials anywhere in the empire could desire," most uncompromisingly condemns the policy pursued. It asks the Viceroy and others to clear themselves. "They may be able to clear themselves," says Mr. Edmond Yates, "by proving disregard or misunderstanding of clear instructions. In any other case, whether of knowledge and sanction, or of ignorance and indifference, a large part of the folly and guilt must rest with them; and the proper penalty of censure or recall must be exacted." We need not say, then, what the language of the Radical journals is. They all condemn severely the Government and all others concerned. Sir W. V. Harcourt means to press the Government to name a day for a debate on Manipur affairs, when he proposes to call attention to the disaster and to the causes thereof, and will ask for the production of further papers relating thereto. On the whole, we fear the Manipur disaster will prove disastrous to the reputation of Lord Lansdowne. [The Portuguez Britannico (159), in its issue of the 30th May, in common with most of its vernacular contemporaries, condemns the action of the British Government in regard to Manipur and wishes that the State should not be annexed to the British Indian Empire.]

Mr. Quinton considered to be responsible for the loss of life at Manipur.

42. The Indu Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 1st June, writes:—What the eventual fate of Manipur is to be is not yet finally settled, but there is reason to think that the view of the Government is in accord with public opinion. It has been stated that the Government of India and the Secretary of State are both opposed to annexation and would prefer to form a local administration under British influence. If the Government of India and the Secretary of State are agreed that annexation is not desirable, we wonder who else has the right to decide what shall be done? It is to be noted that such an imperialist as Sir Richard Temple does not approve of annexation. It may be presumed, therefore, that annexation will not take place. Whatever the conscious intention may be, we fear it will be difficult to contend that an arrest of a person in a Darbár to which he is invited as a mark of honour will not be a breach of faith. When the Senápati defeated the project of the Darbár it was resolved to use force, and this was blunder No. 2. Mr. Quinton was, perhaps, justified in using force to carry out his object, but he knew his force was inadequate and might have waited for a day to arm himself for the fray and allow reinforcements to arrive so as to make defeat impossible. When Mr. Quinton found himself overpowered that he should have gone into the citadel for a personal parley was blunder No. 3. Thus from first to last, defeat and death were in a manner courted by Mr. Quinton. The penalty was heavy—the loss of valuable life and the subsequent retributory expedition under General Graham. Thus, however regrettable the end of Mr. Quinton's expedition, the fault was entirely his, and this last act of his will be an unworthy ending of his on the whole brilliant record in life. We are fully sensible of the maxim "nothing but good should be said of the dead"; but after a calm consideration of the papers under review and the subsequent events, we cannot help observing that the judgment of the impartial historian will be adverse to Mr. Quinton in this particular.

The constitution of the Manipur Court for the trial of Jubráj and others considered unfair.

43. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 4th June, writes:—The suppression of the Manipur disturbance is now followed up by the military trials of the malcontents. The constitution of the Manipur Court reminds us of a similar court formed in Kabul for the trial of prisoners after the capture of Kabul. Telegrams to hand say that the captives are to be given a fair trial, and to be helped in the matter of their defence. A glance at the constitution of the tribunal and the arrangements made for legal advice for the defence of the Jubráj and others cannot fail to strike any one with their hollowness. Such trials are rather intended to strike terror among people than literally to carry out every judicial intention of the law. These trials are, therefore, the shadow and not the substance, and naturally will evoke no feeling of respect for the majesty of law. We can conceive a difference between trials in a well settled country and trials of people in a country newly acquired, but we cannot place Manipur on the same level with a new annexation, for this State, before the catastrophe, has been in alliance with Government and both the Jubráj and the Senápati had received the Commissioner with all courteousness. Moreover, the published Government papers show that, were it not for the proposed arrest, matters would not have come to such a distressful pass. Be that as it may, all these facts point to one thing, and that is that the Jubráj and others, whatever be the nature of their guilt, deserve, even when put upon their trial, a better treatment than they seem likely to receive at the hands of the military court. We are quite sure the Government of Lord Lansdowne will take every possible care that the fairness of the trial is not called into question. [The Bakul (21), in its issue of the 31st May, also disapproves of the constitution of the Commission appointed to try the offenders in the Manipur disturbances, and says that just and impartial judicial officers ought to have been appointed as judges, and the fact of the massacre of the children and women of the family of Jubráj by British officers should be duly considered by the Commission.]

Alleged brutal murder committed at Ujjein in the Gwalior State by a Police Superintendent in the service of the Indore State.

44. The Kesari (42), in its issue of the 2nd June, says:—It seems from the Subodh Sindhu newspaper of Khandwa and private information received by us that a gentleman named Balvant Váman Booti has been recently brutally murdered at Ujjein. Balvant Booti had held important posts in the Native States of Indore and Gwalior. His Highness Mahárája Holkar recently knew that the deceased had communicated some information about his administration to a newspaper. For this or for some other reason, a warrant was issued against him, and with this a Police Superintendent of Indore went with some of his men to Ujjein to arrest him. It is further said that the Police Superintendent arrested Booti at Ujjein, and taking him to a lonely place tortured him brutally. Cuts with a sharp instrument were inflicted on several parts of his body and his tongue was pulled out. He was then taken to a railway station, but the station authorities, seeing that he was in a very precarious state, did not allow him to be put in a carriage. He was then taken back to the town, where he died soon after. A report was spread by the police that he committed suicide by taking opium, and it is also alleged that his body was examined by a doctor. The story is very horrible. His Highness the Mahárája Holkar should promptly enquire into the matter and see that justice is done.

Resolution of the Bombay Government on the Native States and the political officers in charge of them.

45. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 31st May, writes:—The Bombay Government has considered it advisable to issue one more resolution on the relations which should exist between political officers and the Native States in which they serve, as regards the presents and hospitality offered by the latter. Government must have good reasons of its own for adopting the course it has. Of late, it has shown itself very sensitive on this question. It is a healthy sign, as proving that it is aware of what is amiss, and that it is anxious to see matters mended. The present resolution is almost a reminder to the political officers of their duty, and of what Government wishes them to do. In certain Native States, the idea that the political officers should pay for everything they get for their use must sound so novel to the States themselves no less than to the officers concerned that continual reminders at convenient intervals as occasions arise would be of the greatest use. The State takes time to realize the idea, and for a long time it cannot see how the political officer is to live without the Chief's guest-house, or by whatever other euphemism such a place be called, without his equipage, his butler, wines, &c., &c. So little has the Chief seen of certain political officers living at their own expense while within the limits of his State, that he thinks the experiment difficult for them to carry out. He himself is not always willing that the Sáheb should refuse his hospitality. The so-called hospitality endears him to the Sáheb, makes him think better of him, makes him side with him in his disputes with the garássias and others; in short, it is this hospitality to which the Chief owes so much of his tranquillity. Funny stories are recalled to this day of the entertainment offered, not many years back, by Chiefs to political officers. Men in the lower grades of the service fatten themselves on corruption and on the good things of this world that are supplied to them without any cost by the States. We do not know what the practice now is. But some years ago, each clerk in the political officer's establishment got his quantum of grain, ghee and sugar. Did each clerk get the same quantity? No. For the higher clerks the quantity was five or six times what should fall to the lot of one person according to the established rate. A clerk was made more of than a Small Cause Court Judge is here. We hope the Bombay Government includes these petty officials in its late resolution. [The Sudhárak (17), in its issue of the 1st June, highly approves of the resolution and remarks that the credit of it is said to be due to Mr. Lee-Warner, the impartial and upright Secretary to the Bombay Government. The Subodh Patrika (16) of the 31st May and the Kesari (42) of the 2nd June also approve of the resolution and thank Government for it, but express doubts about its being strictly enforced by the political officers. The Hindusthán (105), in its issue of the 31st May, also approves of the circular order, observes that the Native Chiefs also suffer from the visits of private European gentlemen, as the former consider it their duty to entertain richly all Europeans, official or unofficial, and requests Government to try to afford relief to Native States from the burden of the visits of private parties as well.]

Alleged mismanagement in the Jámnagar State.

46. The Praja Mat (115), in its issue of the 30th May, is glad to hear that Colonel Hancock, Acting Political Agent, Káthiáwár, has gone to Jámnagar and that Mr. Wádia, Barrister-at-law, has been engaged by the Darbár to inquire into the embezzlements alleged to have been committed by Mr. Rághav Khavás, and observes:—About two years ago it was rumoured that Rs. 30,000 were entered in the State account books as spent on tea and Rs. 10,000 on mangoes, and the rumour stands uncontradicted up to date. These items are sufficient to cast a suspicion upon the entries in the account books. His Highness the Jám ought to obtain the loan of an experienced Native officer from the British Government to go over the books and detect frauds.

47. The Nyáyadarshak (113), in its issue of the 1st June, observes:—The Jám is a mere puppet in the hands of Jánbái, Mr. Karsan Khavás and some others. It is said that during the visit of the Jám to Bombay in April 1889, an intriguer succeeded in getting from him the sum of Rs. 50,000 for being paid to a certain party. It is also rumoured that a person has been supporting Jánbái in her attempts to get the claims of her son to the gádi being admitted and has been trying to enrich her. Under such circumstances the State must be mismanaged and cannot be improved unless Jánbái and her supporters are removed and an able Diwán is appointed. We also hear that a banker has promised to advance a large sum of money to the partizans of Prince Kálubha, who are trying to get permission from Government to allow him to return to Jámnagar.

48. The Rájyabhakta (116), in its issue of the 2nd June, considers the reply given to the Managing Committee of the Shetrunja temples by Colonel Hancock, Acting Political Agent, Káthiáwár, in connection with his visit to the Shetrunja Hill in the Pálitána State on the 28th March last as unsatisfactory, and requests the Bombay Government to inquire whether or not the visitors, in defiance of the request made to them by the custodian of the hill, walked over certain prohibited places with their boots on and took their dog with them. It is also necessary, observes the paper, to decide whether Colonel Hancock has the power to violate the rules of the temples. It is the right of the Jains to allow or not the non-Jains to visit their temples and to make certain rules in connection with their visits. [The Ahmedabad Times (89), in its issue of the 3rd June, observes that Colonel Hancock should have, instead of giving an evasive reply, admitted his mistake and asked apology of the Jains, whose feelings have been wounded by him and his party. The Times also requests Government to take due notice of this occurrence, as it believes that the Jains are not satisfied with the Colonel's reply.]

Reply from Colonel Hancock, Acting Political Agent, Káthiáwár, to the Managing Committee of the Shetrunja temples, regarding his visit to the Shetrunja Hill, and a request to Government in the matter.

49. The Gujarát Darpan (80), in its issue of the 31st May, writes:—The days of English Nawábs have gone by, still there are found examples of them here and there. We have not to go very far to seek one, for we are likely to find him in Mr. Lely's new First Assistant, Mr. Weir. Rumour whispers that Mr. Weir, when in the Kaira District, had made a name for his temper. She is on her wings again and is gossiping about. She says that he has made his debut as Administrator of Sachin in a way which would sustain the character he has borne hitherto. Already some murmurs have been rife among those who have had to deal with him, although it is not a week since he took charge. On the very first day of his arrival at Camp Bhimpore, a peon or peons were complimented with such epithets as 'bhangi,' 'badmash' and 'gadha.' Their fault was that they were not clothed in as white a dress as he would like. After teaching manners to his peons in this off-hand way, he began to instruct the poor patels what Native etiquette towards such English officers as he should be. He began with the patel of Bhimpore. In the garden surrounding the State bungalow, the officious patel was moving about giving orders to the servants. In the meantime came up the Sáheb, and the patel bowed low and salaamed him. But for all his pains he was fined a rupee by his garibnawáz. Why? The patel was treading on grass and brambles, and yet the rude fellow had not taken off his shoes before salaaming the Sáheb. The Sáheb wanted to be salaamed with the shoes first and then with the hand. Some people have taken the lesson so to heart that they have determined, for fear of being fined, to take off their shoes wherever they meet the Nawáb de facto of Sachin and then to salaam him. We are not able to say what lessons will follow next. But if the British administration of a Native State is facilitated by such lessons, we should think Mr. Weir is a great adept in giving them. But to our simple mind it does not seem facilitated. On the contrary, nothing brings contempt on the administration more than such provocative lessons. Mr. Weir's youth and inexperience may be pleaded as an excuse. However, as he is put in a responsible post, it is the duty of those who have put him there to sober him down. But the success in managing a Native State greatly depends on the personal qualities of its head. Mr. Lely has the reputation of being a very sensible and conscientious officer. Will he not curb the misdirected energy of his subordinate?

A complaint against the conduct of Mr. Weir, Administrator of the Sachin State.

1. The Varhád Samáchár (3), in its issue of the 1st June, writes :—It will be acknowledged on all hands that the religious susceptibilities of the people have been sharpened since the discussions on the famous Consent Bill. This showed itself in the recent occurrences at Benares and Calcutta. Their cause is the interference of Government officers in religious matters. The Government deals with such matters with its usual high-handed policy. The leaders of the so-called Benares rioters have been deported. Though the temple is allowed to stand in situ, still the public are excluded from it. A similar doom awaits for the culprits who took part in the recent disturbances at Calcutta. It was natural that the people should be maddened into fury when they heard that a temple was to be pulled down. The people protested, but to no purpose. What was to be expected from people under these circumstances? It was but natural that they should make up their mind to take the law into their own hands and should be ready to sacrifice even their lives. The Government has virtually carried its own points. The temple will only nominally stand. The public will have no access. The intention of the Government is clear. It wishes to force the people into blind obedience. The people should try their best to resist such an attempt. It is only perseverance and zeal which overcome difficulties. The National Congress has furnished a constitutional means to bring every grievance to light. We must learn to depend upon ourselves and should not look abroad for help.

Remarks on the recent disturbances at Benares and Calcutta.

2. The Vaidarbh (2), in its issue of the 30th May, writes :—Rightly or wrongly, the Benares riot had its origin in the belief that the temple in question was to be pulled down and water-works buildings to be erected in its place. The riot has been suppressed and the ringleaders severely punished. Let also those who gave the false alarm be punished, if possible, more severely. On what principle, however, are the general public to be excluded from the temple? To punish one hundred thousand Hindu residents of Benares and the many pilgrims that go there, because two thousand Hindus and Mahomedans made a riot, is certainly not justice. But this is what the Allahabad Government has done. The religious feelings of the people have been respected so far as to order the temple to remain in situ, though the compound is to be made over to the

The order excluding the general public from a temple at Benares owing to recent riots there considered unjust.

Water Works Department. But, of what use is the temple if people are excluded from it? Surely, temples do not exist for the priests, whom their Government resolution has ordered passes to be given for free egress and ingress. Let us hope that the Government order will not long remain unmodified.

Alleged blunders committed by British officers in the Manipur affair.

3. The same newspaper writes:—The papers placed before the Houses of Parliament do not throw any new light on the series of unfortunate events at Manipur that ended with the total collapse of Mr. Quinton's mission in April last. They do not certainly exculpate the Government of India, nor the late Chief Commissioner of Assam, from the charges of gross blundering and bungling, nor do they very conspicuously show that "straightforward and above suspicion dealing which is our strength" in India. It may have been a very wise resolution to send the Chief Commissioner of Assam to deport the Senápati as the archfiend who had fomented all the recent troubles in Manipur; but we cannot but think that six months were too long a time for coming to such a resolution. The British Government showed no signs of disapproval of the coup de main at Manipur, which deported from the State the ruler who had been recognized as such by the paramount power. Apparently the Government of India acquiesced in the change, for we do not find from the papers that any instructions were sent to the Resident to let the successful rebel brothers of the ex-Rája think that they had not been recognised as the Rája and Jubráj by the Queen-Empress. The Government of India in their letter of defence to the Secretary of State profess to doubt that Jubráj ever came to the Residency, and say that the Darbár was postponed because a proper guard to receive the de facto Mahárája was not ready. But these are mere conjectures which cannot weigh against the clear testimony of the heroic wife of the Resident, who was an eye-witness of how soldiers were placed to guard every door and window, including those of her bedroom. We suppose that the members of the Government itself, if denuded of their official position, would not hesitate to believe, as gentlemen, Mrs. Grimwood's clear, consistent and, above all, disinterested testimony. Bearing these facts in mind, it is impossible to think that the Jubráj "was not lulled into a false sense of security." It will be hard to distinguish between treachery and a stratagem used to capture in a Darbár the Commander-in-Chief of a friendly State without the least shadow of a pretence to show any displeasure, either towards him or towards the ruler he had made and supported. We cannot also see the righteousness of the policy of recognizing as Mahárája one of the two rebels who had subverted the former government and deported its head. If the ex-Mahárája was to be considered as having abdicated and no notice was to be taken of the coup de main in November 1890, itself a very graceless thing—and if his heir was to be recognized as Mahárája, we do not see how the heir of that heir could be deprived of his right to become the Jubráj. "All is well that ends well." Let us no more assail the memory of a trusted and valued servant of the Crown who has lost his life. But we are compelled to review the past, because we want to impress upon the minds of the Government the necessity of remembering all this blundering and bungling in meting out punishments to the rebels that have been captured and in settling the future fate of Manipur. Now that British prestige has been re-established, and the Jubráj is easily and honourably deportable, there is no danger in showing the heavenly graces of mercy and justice.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ā) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Instances of alleged breach of trust on the part of the British Indian Government.

1. The Dnyán Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 8th June, says that the British administration in India is in many respects undoubtedly morally superior to any of the former Governments, but the people of this country are not likely to admit that the intended arrest of the Senápati in a Darbár at Manipur was to be the first act of treachery on the part of the British Indian Government as believed by the English press, which has condemned the scheme of the Manipur Darbár. The Dnyán Prakásh also observes that there is documentary evidence to prove that the British have ere this committed several breaches of trust, and as instances in point refers to the conduct of Lord Clive towards Umichand, the utterances of Lord Lytton in connection with the admission of Natives into the Covenanted Civil Service, and the promise given by Lord Dufferin to the late Jayájiráo Scindia while the latter was on his death-bed.

His Imperial Highness the Czarewitch on the British administration of India.

2. The A'rydvart (20), in its issue of the 6th June, refers to the contents of the letters alleged to have been sent by His Imperial Highness the Czarewitch to his august father while he was on tour in India, and to His Imperial Highness's reported utterances in Japan about the policy followed by the British in the administration of India, and says that these letters and utterances prove that the people of India need entertain no fear of a Russian invasion, but His Imperial Highness was not at all justified in saying that if the British had not made certain arrangements in connection with his Indian tour he should not have been certain of passing safely through India. This remark, adds the paper, of His Imperial Highness unjustifiably casts a slur on the character of the natives of India, and this is extremely painful to them as they spent large sums in honour of his visit to their country.

Recent disturbances at Benares, Calcutta and other places and their causes.

3. The Poona Vaibhav (53), in its issue of the 7th June, says that the recent riots at Benares, Calcutta and some other places are the results of the discontent created among all classes of Indian subjects by the stringent forest laws, the heavy salt duties, the income-tax, the enhanced land revenue assessment, interference with the rights of Inámdárs, Jághirdárs, and Native Chiefs and Princes, the offence given by the Age of Consent Act and the slaughter-houses such as the one at Bandora. The British statesmen, adds the Vaibhav, cannot see the real causes of danger, probably because they are infatuated. As we are perfectly loyal to Government we do not like that such disturbances should take place; but, at the same time, we cannot blame the rioters, seeing how the people have been treated of late by Government. Instead of simply punishing the rioters in a summary way Government ought to find out and remove the cause of these disturbances. [The Kalpataru (39), in its issue of the 7th June, expresses similar sentiments.]

Remarks on the assertion made by the Morning Post of Allahabad about seditious rumours prevailing in the North-West Provinces.

4. In alluding to the assertion made by the Morning Post of Allahabad that seditious rumours are prevailing at Allahabad, Cawnpur, Lucknow, Agra and other important places in the North-West Provinces, attributing these rumours to the people having grown suspicious of Government interference in religious matters, the Bhárat Bhráta (140), in its issue of the 5th June, states :—The above is not mere rumour, and the people of that part of the country say that the English administration has of late grown very weak. Whether the Government takes it in good or bad part we will certainly cherish our religion, and make the actual condition of the country public. The original causes of this rumour are the Age of Consent Act, the poverty of India and inattention to the prayers of the people.

Recruitment and expenses of a regiment to be kept at Hongkong.

5. The Jáme Jamshed (84), in its issue of the 12th June, writes :—By an edict of the British War Office, Hongkong, which has for generations formed part of China, is to be in future included in the military map of India. The change is to take place in this way. A regiment composed of natives of India is to be raised in India, officered by Indian Staff Corps officers, and transferred to Hongkong, where it will be permanently stationed. It is to be a regiment maintained up to the war strength of one thousand bayonets, and the men are to be drawn from the Mahomedans of the Panjáb. It is, therefore, intended to be a fighting force capable of meeting the military necessities of the situation. India has heretofore had nothing to do with supplying troops for British service in China. The military and naval force which the British Government found it necessary to maintain in that country has been British from top to bottom and has had nothing to do with India. But by the proposed arrangement India will be required to supply the soldiers for this new force, and the Indian Staff Corps will be required to supply the officers. This new description of military force in China is required not by India nor for India, but by England for England. At the outset the British Government will admit that India will not be responsible for any portion of the cost of this force and that this country will only be called upon to give its friendly aid in providing recruits and a complement of Staff Corps officers. And it will be affirmed that a separate expenditure account will be opened, in which will be included every item of expenditure incurred on account of the New Hongkong Regiment. The Government of India will be told to relieve itself of all anxiety on account of the new regiment, and that every item of expense would be debited to the British Government. The Indian Government may be required to furnish the new corps with arms, ammunition, clothing, transport, &c., but it will be told to charge every expense to the British Government. We must await all these explanations of details, for in the absence of these details there is no room for protest. The only thing to which objection may reasonably be taken at this stage is that in all previous co-partnership arrangements between the British and the Indian Governments the pecuniary advantages have always accrued to the former Government. That Government may not be better financiers than the Indian Government, but they have always had the power of saying the last word, as well as of being arbitrators in their own case. Now that a mixing up of accounts and responsibilities is sure to occur in an Indian Hongkong arrangement, unless the Government of India are strong and firm and insist on a new departure in accounts which will relieve the revenues of this country of every possible liability for the new force in Hongkong, India will be drawn into the Chinese organization.

Remarks on the correspondence between the Secretary of State for India and His Excellency the Viceroy regarding the amendment of the Factory Act.

6. The Mahratta (4), in its issue of the 7th June, says:—The correspondence regarding the amendment of the Factory Act between the Secretary of State for India and the Viceroy has been published. It is worth reading. Not because there is much information in it of a useful nature showing the necessity of undertaking legislation, but because therein we get a glimpse of the real state of affairs regarding the position of the Government of India. The Secretary of State is the virtual ruler of India. His orders to the Viceroy are very peremptory. "The Bill must be proceeded with and passed this session without fail." That is the order given to the Viceroy. Why is the order given? Not because the Secretary of State considers the condition of the mill-hands as in any way in urgent need of improvement, but because of the pressure brought to bear upon him by the Lancashire "philanthropists." This is how we are governed. Parliament has very little control over our officials, and what little power it has it rarely uses, and, when using it, uses it to a wrong purpose.

Disapproval of the honour conferred on the Honourable Mr. C. B. Pritchard, Member of the Bombay Executive Council.

7. The Kaiser-i-Hind (85), in its issue of the 7th June, observes:—It is quite natural that people should strongly disapprove of the distinction of K.C.I.E. conferred on the Honourable Mr. C. B. Pritchard by the recent Birthday Gazette, as he has made himself very unpopular by his oppressive ábkári policy. Mr. Pritchard has always cared to fill the Government coffers without showing least sympathy for the people, and officers like him, by their mistaken policy, produce discontent among the people. In the Executive Council Mr. Pritchard has been of little use, and as he has completed the full term of his service and has, besides, got the abovementioned high honour, it is the general desire that he should now retire. [The Samsher Bakddur (117) and the Surya Prakdsh (88), in their issues of the 5th and 6th June respectively, express similar sentiments.]

Revival of the Vernacular Press Act recommended.

8. The Bhámini Prakdsh (23), in its issue of the 10th June, after lamenting the present condition of the vernacular press, says that the recent riots at several places in this country were caused by the publication of seditious articles in several Native newspapers, and requests Government to revive the Vernacular Press Act.

Suggestions made by some Anglo-Indian newspapers to gag the Native press deprecated.

9. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 11th June, writes:—Again the cry is raised against the amount of liberty the Native press enjoys. The arguments in favour of putting a curb upon it are not new; they take up their cue from the alleged seditious writings of some Native newspapers. But is it a fact that the Native press is really as seditious as some attempt to represent it? Of course, they do expose official vagaries and irregularities, but is the exposure of such vagaries so necessary to put the Government of the country straight? The expressions of loyalty to the Crown are so frequent and so palpable that a diseased mind alone may refuse to put faith into them. But Anglo-India does not really wish a total extinction of the Native papers, but desires to enjoy full liberty at their expense. And suppose some members of the Native press often outstep the bounds of honest discretion, who is it that sets the example to them? Examples may not be wanting in which some Anglo-Indian journals may be found to abuse their own liberty and thus set a bad example to the Native press, which in its present condition has much to depend for its light and leading on the Anglo-Indian journals. We are not prepared to say that there are no black sheep amongst us; but to condemn a whole brotherhood for the back-slidings of one or two is, perhaps, most uncharitable. These may require timely correction and a timely hint; or the enforcement of the sections of the Penal Code can curb the evil more satisfactorily than a whole machinery organised to hold it under check.

Disapproval of Dr. Pollen's remarks on the agitation in the Bombay Presidency against the Age of Consent Act.

10. The Poona Vaibhav (53), in its issue of the 7th June, disapproves of the remarks made by Dr. Pollen, the Agent for Sardárs in the Deccan, in connection with the Age of Consent Act in his speech at the Darbár recently held at Poona in honour of the birthday of Her Majesty the Queen-Empress, and remarks:—A Darbár is not the place to find fault with or praise other men's opinions, and Dr. Pollen's remarks have offended the feelings of several Sardárs who attended the Darbár. When laws are constantly passed to benefit Government at the expense of the rayats, are we expected to say that the Age of Consent Act alone is conducive to our happiness? We have left to the reformers the task of praising Government for the Age of Consent Act and cannot accept the advice tendered by Dr. Pollen as it offends our feelings. [The Shri Shiváji (63), in its issue of the 5th June, expresses similar sentiments.]

Remarks on the meeting of Hindus and Mahomedans recently held at Bombay to adopt a memorial to Parliament against the Age of Consent Act.

11. The Mahomedan Herald (143), in its issue of the 8th June, observes:—We are unable to see why the meeting recently held at Bombay to adopt a memorial to Parliament against the Age of Consent Act should be called Mahomedan as well as Hindu. It is true that Moulvi Hidáyatullah was called to the chair by the Hindus in order to flatter and coax Mahomedans, and that Khán Bahádur Ghulám Mahomed Munshi, inconsistently with his former sensible and laudable career, took a passive part in it. But we are unable to understand how a meeting composed of one Mahomedan to twenty Hindus—most of the few Mahomedans, again, for aught we know, may have been mere spectators—could be called a Mahomedan meeting. We feel that it would lower our name in the eyes of Government and of several communities that understand the point at issue. We pray the two men of influence and position that were there to think again and give up the vain cry and the unmeaning protest. It is a sham cry "Defence of religion": we are inclined to exclaim "Isti defensores." [The Din Bandhu (9), in its issue of the 7th June, says that the number of persons who attended this meeting was less than a thousand, and this clearly shows that the majority of the people of Bombay are not opposed to the Age of Consent Act, which they are most willing to obey.]

12. The Rást Goftár (86), in its issue of the 7th June, writes:—We thought the agitation against the raising of the age of consent was now dead, and we were in hopes that good sense would, in course of time, dawn upon its opponents. It, however, seems from a meeting held last Sunday near the Victoria Gardens that the agitation has not yet completely died out. Here the apostles of unreason, both among Hindus and Mahomedans, combined their forces to make a feeble, expiring effort to make themselves heard. They have adopted a petition to the House of Commons. That they took so long after the measure had been finally passed to rally their forces for one last struggle, shows that the vitality of its opponents is now at a very low ebb. We should have ignored their petition, had it not been amusing on account of its inconsistencies and naive absurdities. The petitioners declare that in fixing the limit of age at twelve years, the Legislature has laid down "a numerical and unscientific" limit. The Act violates the Hindu ecclesiastical law, which the memorialists consider has been based on reason and science in the sense in which they take it, and yet in support of their contention they quote with approval from a minute by Sir James Fergusson in which he says that "superstitions and unnatural social traditions can never be abolished by being directly attacked; they become obsolete and perish when civilization has outgrown them." It would seem, therefore, that, in spite of their clamour and protests, these gentlemen have an unconscious and instinctive perception that the custom which they seek to uphold is "superstitious and unnatural." This involuntary perception of truth on their part is again apparent when they state further on that the gracious promises of the Queen-Empress conveyed in the Proclamation of 1858 should not be violated "for the purpose of forcing reform." Then is the fixing of "a numerical and unscientific" limit a reform after all? A sentence in the petition affords a striking illustration of the combination which is found among Natives of intense and advanced radicalism in political matters. If the "rigour" were mitigated by the admission into the Legislative Councils of such "real representatives of the people" as the leading petitioners presumably consider themselves to be, we might expect to go back to the days of Sati, infanticide, Thagism and such other harmless "religious" observances! The petition would be a painful document, were it not so amusing.

13. The Subodh Patrika (16), in its issue of the 7th June, writes:—The Bombay opponents of the Age of Consent law had their "mass" meeting, as they called it, on last Sunday. The memorial adopted at the meeting goes upon the old lines and makes it clear that the leading spirits of this opposition to the law have not yet learnt to be accurate in their statement of facts. It is the height of audacity on the part of these gentlemen to assert that the evil which the law seeks to suppress is more imaginary than real, in the face of the fact that even Sir Romesh Chunder Mitter has been forced to admit its existence, though he has said that it does not exist to what he calls a culpable extent. They also forget the boast of their own party, which is a well-founded one, that such cases rarely come to the knowledge of the public, for the social sentiment is entirely opposed to their exposure, and they are almost always hushed up, except when the extreme nature of the injury renders that attempt impossible. The number of cases, therefore, which comes before the Courts or the public forms no index to the extent of the evil. Again, the instances which have come before the Courts in Bengal and of which Sir Andrew Scoble gave a summary in his speech at the second reading of the Bill, have been studiously ignored by the speakers at last Sunday's meeting. This fact alone is a sufficient condemnation of the memorial adopted by it, and Parliament need not go beyond it to justify itself in rejecting the prayer of the memorial as one sought to be supported by inhumanity on the one hand and barefaced inaccuracy of statement on the other. Then there are the speeches of the other members, official and non-official, which deal a crushing blow to every argument the opposition raised to the Bill, but which do not appear to have been even alluded to during the late proceedings. This omission is remarkable when taken together with the wild and rabid notices taken by the irresponsible press writers arrayed against the Bill. The appeal to Parliament, therefore, quite passes by the grounds on which the decision appealed against is based. It is, perhaps, a natural sequel to Mr. Pincott's article in the National Review, and we are not sorry that the appeal has been made, because it will only serve to show the hollowness of the opposition to a measure which in the eyes of all right-thinking Indians (and they are many) errs on the side of moderation and places the limit of protection to tender girls at 12 years instead of raising it at least to 14.

14. The Vártáhar (18), in its issue of the 7th June, says:—It was very creditable to the Hindus and Mahomedans of Bombay that they should have forgotten their other differences and joined in carrying out the object of the meetting; but the reformers appear to have been much perplexed by the success of the gathering, since they say that the number of those who attended it was about two thousand in spite of the fact that the audience numbered more than five thousand.

A letter making indecent allusions published in the Poona Vaibhav newspaper.

15. The Poona Vaibhav (53), in its issue of the 17th May, publishes a letter signed by a woman, named Durga, in which the writer requests the Hindu social reformers who supported the Age of Consent Bill, to find out means for removing the sufferings of innumerable Indian women whose husbands happen to suffer from impotency. She says that these women lead an immoral life and bring ruin upon themselves and their families, and opines that Hindu men and women should live as husband and wife before the religious performance of marriage. This letter appears to be a satire on the Age of Consent Act and is written in indelicate language, making indecent allusions. [The Bhámini Prakásh (23), in its issue of the 3rd June, condemns the above letter as indecent, and requests Government to take proper notice of it, as the Poona Vaibhav frequently indulges in such writings.]

Rigour of the Arms Act and the consequent increase in the depredations of wild animals.

16. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 11th June, writes:—Government may look with just pride upon the strides with which the forest revenue is increasing, but it cannot afford to forget that in proportion to its revenue insecurity of life is also increasing owing to the increased depredations of wild beasts. Ravages on human life and cattle are not confined to any particular part of India; they are general more or less, but Government will not allow free use of arms for protection against wild beasts. Parts of the Central Provinces are so freely infested by these creatures that the entertainment of the services of a special officer for their destruction has become a necessity. We are afraid, however, that no single special officer can protect a whole people against the nightly attacks of these animals, and yet the Chief Commissioner seems to think that such an arrangement may be a guarantee against this evil. According to the Bombay Gazette, only in Narsingpur 23 persons were killed and 20 wounded, while in Hoshangabad 95 lost their lives owing to the visits of man-eaters, and one does not know how many more lives may yet be destroyed. For the security of a country against foreign invasion troops are employed, but we have never heard of the security of people against the inroads of beasts being entrusted, not to the people themselves, but to outsiders. Indeed, this is a novel way of according protection to them. Really, Government's determination for a restricted use of arms is highly unreasonable. Pity it is that the question should not receive that amount of serious attention which it so richly deserves. We say, cannot a strong protest be made against Government immobility in the matter of people's protection?

Evils caused by the forest laws including an increase in the number of wolves in the Central Provinces.

17. The Bombay Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 11th June, observes:—The forest laws have given rise to several evils. One of these is that the people cannot get sufficient fuel to cook their food, which they are obliged to eat half-cooked. This seriously affects their health, sending them to an early grave. The other evil is the increase in the number of wild animals. Of late the number of wolves has considerably increased in the Central Provinces, and it has been complained that they attack and kill children as well as grown up persons in large numbers. Great efforts have been made by the authorities of those parts for the destruction of these animals, but appreciable success has not been attained. It is said that in 1888 certain arrangements were made by the Commissioner of the Central Provinces in regard to the conservation of forests, which have thereby grown very thick, affording shelter to a large number of wolves that cannot find their food in the forests themselves and commit inroads on the populated parts of the province. It is, therefore, to be hoped that the arrangements of 1888 will be undone and orders issued for thinning the forests, as in such case the wolves would be deprived of the shelter they now find and their number would lessen.

A lecture given by the Honourable Ráo Bahádur M. G. Ránade on "Public Opinion in India: Is it possible?" at the Poona Vasantotsava series of lectures.

18. The Sudhárak (17), in its issue of the 8th June, writes:—On Friday last the Honourable Ráo Bahádur M. G. Ránade delivered a characteristically thoughtful address on "Public Opinion in India: Is it possible?" in connection with this year's Vasantotsava series of lectures. It may be within the recollection of many that, last year a clever article on this subject appeared in the Madras Christian College Magazine from the pen of that able, but not very sympathetic, gentleman—Mr. Lee-Warner. The article attracted considerable attention at that time, and was approvingly noticed by the Anglo-Indian press. Of course, the writer's conclusion was that, circumstanced as India was, it was not possible for her to have a public opinion. Mr. Lee-Warner's position was this: The Indian society was divided into an infinite number of castes and divisions. The religious cast of the mind of the people and their vis inertia or passivity made them pre-eminently conservative, and the ignorance of the masses was phenomenal or abysmal. Owing to all these reasons, it was impossible to have anything like a real public opinion in India. There was no warrant for saying that the Native mind was longing for political reform, because it was unreasonable to expect that a people who hugged with desperate energy all the religious and social institutions of the past, with all their corruption and all their degradation, could really desire change in political matters. Mr. Lee-Warner pointed to the condition of Native States as an illustration of what he said. Mr. Ránade dwelt at considerable length on the subject, speaking for nearly two hours. In his opinion the real question to ask was not 'Is public opinion possible in India?' but 'Why is public opinion in India so weak and so spasmodic?' Mr. Ránade agreed with Mr. Lee-Warner in regard to the evil influences of our divisions and superstitious tendencies, vis inertia and ignorance. But he was of opinion that these hindering forces were bound to disappear before the spirit of the age, which was towards unification and knowledge, and was destructive of sectarianism and false pride and false patriotism. It was impossible, he said, for the Indian nation to stand still while the rest of the world was moving towards the happy land of knowledge and enlightenment, and the only question before the Indian people was whether they would consciously and volutarily move forward or whether they would merely drift along the current. In earnest and eloquent terms, the speaker exhorted his hearers to realize the dignity of man as man, and strive for the happiness and elevation of the whole human race. Mr. Ránade intends to shortly put his thoughts on the subject in writing, and his views will therefore soon be available to the public in a durable and permanent form.

A recommendation either to re-employ Ráo Bahádur Mulé, Huzur Deputy Collector, Sátára, in spite of his indebtedness or to give him full pension.

19. The Nyáya Sindhu (51) of the 8th June regrets that the Bombay Government should have made Ráo Bahádur N. B. Mulé, Huzur Deputy Collector of Sátára, retire on half pension on account of his indebtedness, without taking into consideration his long and meritorious services to the State, and requests Government either to re-employ him or to give him full pension.

Instances of alleged inefficiency of the police and unbearably wanton conduct of the military.

20. The Mahratta (4), in its issue of the 7th June, writes:—The protection of our persons and properties is, we know, entrusted to the police and the military, and their security mainly depends upon the efficiency and morality of the latter. The whole country has been crying against the inefficiency of the police and unbearably wanton conduct of the military, but Government has paid no heed to our cries. The necessity of reforming the Police Department so as to attract into its ranks men of good birth and education is admitted, but beyond making a convenient admission Government has not gone. In the case of wantonness of conduct indulged in by the members of the military service Government is pleased to issue important resolutions now and then, but no effective action is ever taken. This looseness of conduct on the part of Government has had a very degenerating effect, and cases in which police constables stand charged before the Magistrate for theft and other offences are becoming frequent. It was only about a month ago that a police peon in the head-quarter lines at Poona was convicted by a Magistrate of stealing the clothes of his comrade in the lines, and a Presidency Magistrate at Bombay convicted two policemen of committing theft. Employés of the department are thus making practical protests against the quality of the personnel composing the ranks, and it is a thousand pities that notice is not taken of such specific instances and the department overhauled. The Provincial Conference that met during the last month passed a resolution condemning in respectful terms the present Police Department and suggesting that a commission of inquiry be appointed. In commenting upon this resolution the Bombay Gazette observed that there was not the least chance of Government conceding to the request of the Conference, because the District Police Act was but recently passed. We really fail to see what the Act has to do with the reform. The Act lays down the four lines of the department, gives the gradation of officers and the powers of the police generally. It does not touch upon the personnel of the department at all. This must be done under the rules, and we think the reform asked for can only be subsequent and not antecedent to the passing of such an Act. Neither the formation of detective and protective branches, nor the admission of persons qualified to become members of the service, nor the subject of their pay and promotion, involves any change in the Act. There can be no greater disgrace to a department than that there should ever arise a necessity for making use of the fetters upon themselves which are entrusted to them for use upon others. This is a grievance grave enough; but the grievance of soldiers shooting innocent persons is graver still. There are other grievances of a more serious nature. One of this kind has recently come under our notice. It does not refer to any action by a Government servant against an innocent private fellow-subject, nor does it refer to fellow members of the service. It is wanton conduct by military men against Government and law. Cases in which soldiers drive carriages and camels, and horses and dogs, through toll-bars without paying tolls—cases in which they levy compulsory labour upon carts and coolies—are not seldom, and the indulgence with which this conduct is noticed is encouraging these privileged servants of the State to indulge in still greater wantonness and commit a breach of the law. Without mentioning names, we shall here relate a case in which a military gentleman, not only refused to follow the requirements of civil law, but threatened to punish the gentleman charged with its administration for trying to enforce it. But what is more surprising and, for the matter of that, more annoying was that he broke the law and is reported to have passed unpunished. About ten biscuit boxes weighing 17 maunds arrived at the railway station of Poona, and one —— asked the keeper of the toll-bar to let them pass without payment of octroi duty. The keeper objected. Whereupon the said —— wrote to the Náka Kárkun to the following effect: "Allow these boxes to pass at once as they have done before on several occasions for two years. If my orderly reports that you will not allow him to take them away after receipt of this, I will come down myself and see that you get punished for delaying the delivery of the boxes." It appears from this that on more than one occasion municipal octroi duty was evaded and goods taken away. We understand that by allowing the biscuit boxes to pass free of duty the kárkun saved himself a good deal of thrashing, but the municipality lost about Rs. 3. We have no doubt everybody that reads this will agree with us in saying that the sepoy and the kárkun at the toll-bar ought not to have let the boxes go. As the municipal rules require, they should have detained the goods and applied to the nearest Magistrate. In letting the goods go they showed culpable timidity. But the gentleman to whom the goods belonged turned a single fault to three. He obstructed a public servant in the performance of his duty, he mulcted the municipality in the sum of three rupees, and he intimidated the gate-keeper. We can quite conceive how the weak-hearted kárkuns and timid sepoys should give way to such threats from European gentlemen. To save their own disgrace, and, perhaps, to avoid a scuffle, the kárkuns, if we believe the gentleman, let such goods go and never bring such cases to the notice of their superior officers, so that such cases never come to light; but now that a case has come to light, the municipality ought not to fight shy of the matter. They must take steps to legally proceed against the importer of the biscuit boxes, recover municipal dues and get the gentleman to pay exemplary fine so as to serve as a warning. Such cases ought not to occur at least in Poona, where we have a strong municipality, a strong magistracy and impartial officers and strong public opinion. Unless Government takes notice of such cases and metes out exemplary punishment, it will teach a very bad lesson to the Natives. We remember two or three instances in which the Government of Lord Reay made examples of high European officers, and we have every hope Lord Harris will do the same. We take up these three cases to show to Government that disregard of public opinion is gradually doing mischief, and if the same disregard to public opinion continues to be shown, the officers of Government will themselves produce more disorder, greater discontent and more lasting ill-fame than any organs of public opinion can. Municipalities and local boards are not less to be respected than Government. They are a part and parcel of the governing machinery, and their orders and prestige ought to have as much weight and respect in their respective areas as the central Government must have within theirs. It is not altogether out of place to mention here that during the official administration of the Poona Municipality a distinction was made between European and Native importers, and this faulty practice must have encouraged such conduct. But to the credit of self-government let us say that they deal with members of both the communities with equal justice. Had Mr. East been in Poona at this time, perhaps action by the municipality in this case would have added one more item to the long list of charges, but now that we live under a changed atmosphere we have no such fears. Let the matter be thoroughly gone into and municipal servants be protected.

21. The Kaiser-i-Hind (85), in its issue of the 7th June, writes:—We feel we would be wanting in our duty as publicists if we allowed this opportunity to pass without referring to the highly commendable spirit in which the Coroner of Bombay conducted his inquest over the two Pársi ladies who died by a fall from the Rájábái Tower and the still more commendable and fair spirit in which he acquitted himself in the arduous duty of summing up the mass of evidence piled during the course of the inquest. The Coroner may rest completely satisfied that his conduct throughout has been the theme of universal praise by all classes of the community. But for his firmness and impartiality, worthy of a Rhadamanthus, we do not know how the inquest might have ended. It is a trial of this character that tests the worth of a really fair-minded and independent Coroner—a Coroner who conducts his investigation with an open mind and without any preconceived and fantastic theories of his own. The masterly and elaborate summing up of the evidence shows in each line how impartially he has acted throughout. It is a document which might have done credit to any experienced Judge of our High Court. We, along with the entire community of Bombay, cannot withhold our meed of praise for the patience, perseverance, ability and judicial equanimity he brought to bear upon this undoubtedly the greatest and most historical inquest ever held in the city.

The Coroner of Bombay highly praised for the patience, ability and judicial equanimity shown by him in the inquiry into the Rájábái Tower tragedy.

22. The Jáme Jamshed (84), in its issue of the 13th June, writes:—The Government resolution on the Rájábái Tower tragedy case has advanced that case a step forward and in the only right direction in which it could well be advanced. The Chief Magistrate will now re-open the investigation and take the most material evidence. A second investigation will be rendered easier than the previous one, because the chief points in the case have been laid bare by the first exhaustive inquiry. Will the police still conduct the inquiry with the view of supporting a foregone conclusion, or will they go to the work with open minds? The difficulties of the second inquiry will not be diminished by calling upon the previous witnesses to answer with exactness all the questions which were previously asked of them. This difficulty is increased with each subsequent inquiry. It is probable that the friends of the deceased ladies will employ counsel to conduct their case. This will equalize the cross-examinations and bring out the facts. Government have made no reference to the conduct of the police beyond reminding them that "they have every confidence that the Bombay Police appreciate that for the honour and reputation of the force they belong to, extraordinary efforts to clear up a dark mystery are required of them." This is just what the public have been saying for the last six weeks, and yet the mystery remains as mysterious as ever and the time for successful action is passing rapidly away. Government are not in favour of offering a money reward to informers, and the resolution discusses at some length the principle and the effects of these money rewards. Parliament is referred to as a final authority in favour of discouraging these rewards being offered by Government Though there is not any very great experience of the good or bad features of these rewards in Bombay, yet such experience as we have does not show that they lead to injustice or to mischief. Private persons, we are told, are not precluded from offering rewards, and in this venture they will be allowed to risk their money if they chose to do so. By not offering a reward Government will certainly save their money. Our own impression is that the Jáme Jamshed fund should have been freely used for this purpose during the early days of the inquest. The police did not succeed in ascertaining all those who were on the tower premises at the time the ladies were killed. They did not know that the four Pársi children were there, and if these children escaped their scrutiny might not others have escaped it also? The thing was quite possible, and yet the search for persons who may have escaped ended in nothing.

23. The Bombay Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 11th June, observes:—The conduct hitherto adopted by the police in regard to the detection of the perpetrators of the Rájábái Tower fatality lends little encouragement to the public to expect such efforts on the part of the police as would succeed in throwing appreciable light on the mystery. It is, however, to be hoped that the confidence in the police entertained by the Bombay Government is founded upon good reasons and will bear good fruit. Government are unwilling to offer a reward and quote the practice followed in England in support of their action, but the offer of rewards made by the Government of India for the apprehension of Jubráj and other insurgents at Manipur does not support the policy advocated by the Bombay Government. Hitherto there has been material difference of opinion between the public and the police in connection with the mystery, and hence the former will not be satisfied with the advice of Government to put every confidence in the working of the police. It is desirable, therefore, that a public meeting should be early convened by the leaders of Native society for the purpose of deciding upon what further steps should be taken in regard to the mystery. [The Akhbár-e Sodágar (91), in its issue of the 12th June, expresses similar sentiments.]

Disapproval of the verdict of the Coroner's jury in the Rájábái Tower tragedy case.

24. The Dnyán Prakásh (12), in its issue of the 8th June, writes:—It is said that the verdict of the Coroner's jury in the Rájábái Tower fatality case on its being read was received with loud applause by the crowd assembled in the Court, and that the Coroner himself on leaving the Court was loudly cheered. The jury have, no doubt, had a very difficult and complicated case to deal with; but we must confess that, let the real solution of the mystery be what it may, the verdict of the jury has taken us quite by surprise. In our opinion, the evidence placed before the jury was not such as to justify them in returning the verdict they have done. We for our part would say that the evidence was of such a conflicting character as to preclude all reasonable possibility of any definite and decisive verdict being returned; for, we are inclined to think that the evidence recorded by the Coroner does not conclusively support any of the three theories put forward in connection with the tragedy, viz., accident, suicide and outrage coupled with murder. It would seem that the evidence given by the Pársi girl,

Nawásbái Engineer, and her two uncles, as well as by Arjun Ráma, Abdul Kádar and others, has been almost exclusively relied on by the jury in arriving at the particular verdict they have given. It is unnecessary at this stage of the inquiry to closely examine the evidence, but we may briefly indicate the reasons why we consider the verdict returned by the Coroner's jury to be unsatisfactory. According to the jury's verdict the facts held by them to be established are (a) that the two deceased ladies were quite gay and cheerful when at or about 3-15 P.M. they went down from the top balcony of the tower followed by Mánekji Asláji; (b) that shortly before that time two persons, who are said to be Khojás, had gone down the top balcony after having had a brief conversation with Mánekji Asláji; (c) that shortly before 3-30 P.M. the two deceased ladies returned to the top balcony with their dresses disarranged and in some parts torn, and with sad or mournful countenances, and that they were followed by Mánekji Asláji; (d) that the two deceased ladies with Mánekji Asláji went to a different part of the balcony, from which they were not visible to the three Pársi children; and (e) finally, that shortly after 3-30 P.M. Mánekji Asláji ran past them with his coat unbuttoned and with his hat in hand, and hurriedly went down. Shortly after this Nawázbái and her party returned to the ground floor and saw the bodies of the two deceased ladies. Now, having regard to what was deposed to by a Gujaráti Hindu witness (Bhagwándás) in the earlier part of the inquiry before the Coroner about the abusive and indecent expression said to have been uttered by Mánekji Asláji within the hearing of the two deceased ladies before the latter first ascended the staircase leading to the tower, it is in no small degree surprising that after having reached the top balcony and after having seen him following them they should not have avoided Mánekji Asláji and sought the protection of Nawázbái and her party or any of the other parties which had been there, instead of going down with him. Again, it is inexplicable that after having escaped from those who had attempted to ravish them without success the two deceased ladies again went up to the top balcony of the tower. Is it not more reasonable to suppose that their first impulse under such circumstances should have been to go down and seek protection against a repetition of the alleged dastardly attempt to ravish them in a place of public resort? Again, if the story about the alleged unsuccessful attempt to ravish them be really well-founded, it is inexplicable that Mánekji Asláji should not have made good his escape along with the two Khojás who are alleged to have made that attempt, instead of going up with them to the top balcony and of thereby running the risk of being seen in their company under such suspicious circumstances. Moreover, it is still more inexplicable that Mánekji Asláji, if he be really guilty of the charge alleged against him, should have been seen along with the crowd in the University Buildings compound after the tragedy had taken place. Is it not more reasonable to suppose that, as in the case of the two Khojás who are alleged to have made the unsuccessful attempt to ravish the two deceased ladies, he too would have run away from the scene of his alleged crime and sought safety in the retirement and seclusion of his own residence? It is equally inexplicable that, if the elder of the two deceased ladies had committed suicide by throwing herself down from the top balcony, Mánekji Asláji should have committed murder by throwing the other lady down, when it stands to reason to suppose that she would have followed the example of the other and committed suicide. And, finally, it is in no small degree surprising that the two deceased ladies, on their return to the top balcony after the alleged unsuccessful attempt to ravish them, should not have said a word to Nawázbái and her two uncles, who were not much younger than the younger of the two deceased ladies, about the alleged attempt to ravish them. In short, we agree with the writer in the Times of India in holding that the verdict of the Coroner's jury on Wednesday last has made confusion worse confounded. In our opinion, the forementioned points require to be cleared up before the verdict given by the Coroner's jury can be accepted as satisfactory and convincing. In the second place, if there be any truth in the story about the mysterious bundle of tattered clothes with four currency notes of Rs. 10 each in the pocket of one of the said tattered clothes and a letter by Mánekji Asláji making an appointment with the person, or persons, to whom it was addressed, to meet them at the tower, and, moreover, if there be any truth in the allegation made that the two ladies on whose behalf or in connection with whom the appointment was made by Mánekji Asláji did not keep the appointment, it does not stand to reason to suppose that Mánekji Asláji, even if he were the greatest villain, could have abruptly fixed upon the two deceased ladies, who, it is believed, accidentally turned up at the University Buildings, as the victims to be handed over to his profligate employers. If what is alleged about Mánekji Asláji be well-founded, then he must have been an old and experienced hand at his disgusting and dirty profession, and it is scarcely reasonable to suppose that an old and experienced hand at that kind of work could have acted so indiscreetly and clumsily as he is alleged to have done in this instance. Be that as it may, it is certainly not easy to account for the absence of screams during a period of well-nigh fifteen minutes during which the two deceased ladies are alleged to have been subjected to a brutal outrage even though it was not successful, and that too at a place of public resort actually visited by a lot of persons on the particular afternoon; while it is still more difficult to account for the absence of any complaint by the two deceased ladies when on returning to the top balcony they encountered Nawázbái and her party. It is equally difficult to understand why Nawázbái and her two uncles, after having seen the two deceased ladies in that particular condition, should not have followed the most ordinary and reasonable course of endeavouring to ascertain from the two deceased ladies the cause of the sudden change in their condition after so short an interval. Having regard to the intelligence of Nawázbái and her two uncles, it is surely not too much to expect from them a reasonable explanation of their failure to ascertain from the two deceased ladies or from Mánekji Asláji the cause of the former's sufferings. We have thus briefly indicated the reasons why we cannot consider the verdict given by the Coroner's jury to be satisfactory. As we have already stated at the outset, we confess that the evidence recorded would not have equally justified a verdict based on the theory of voluntary suicide; in short, there was not, in our opinion, sufficient evidence before the jury to enable them to arrive at a definite conclusion. [The O Portugues Britannico (159), in itsi ssue of the 6th June, and the Bombay correspondent of the Kesari (42), in its issue of the 9th June, also express surprise at the verdict.]

25. The Din Bandhu (9), in its issue of the 7th June, writes:—The verdict of the Coroner's jury did not come upon us as a surprise, because we knew how the wind blew and we could very well anticipate the result of the inquiry. To the Pársi community and to those who from the very beginning strongly imagined that the fall of the ladies was due to some foul play, the verdict will be highly satisfactory; but to those who can weigh and appreciate evidence, it is most astonishing and quite contrary to the facts elicited during the investigation. From the verdict the jurors have given it would appear that the jury, instead of confining themselves to the evidence before them, must have weighed in their minds other matters touching the deaths of the two ladies about which all sorts of rumours were afloat; otherwise we fail to find clear and positive evidence to warrant them to come to the conclusion they have arrived at. We are equally anxious to arrive at the truth of this mysterious catastrophe, but the more we sift the evidence already given the more uncertain and doubtful do we become as to its positive bearing on any one of the three theories of suicide, accident or outrage. Besides, the evidence is so very conflicting and contradictory that the verdict of the jury seems to us to be quite unnatural and opposed to probabilities. A good deal has been made of the evidence of the three Pársi children, but the very fact of their giving evidence in a parrot-like manner and their identifying a man whom they had an opportunity of seeing only for a minute or so, show what value should be attached to their evidence. One most remarkable feature of this incident is that although the two ladies saw these children there when they were being chased by Mánekji Asláji neither they nor the children, who seem to be very intelligent and bold, screamed out for help. Moreover, the jury seem to have quite ignored the important evidence of Dr. Sidney Smith, who does not support the theory of outrage at all. Of course, our sympathy is fully on the side of the two deceased ladies, and we trust that no stone will be left unturned to find out the most conclusive evidence, if it could be had, before the case goes to the sessions. We admire the unity of the Pársi community and the vigorousness of their press, but we cannot help thinking that they have in the present instance shown themselves extremely biased and crochetty. Their insinuations against the Bombay Police and their demand for a special commission to inquire into this case are groundless and unreasonable. We have seen how some of those matters, out of which the Pársi press tried to make a great capital, when came to be deposed to before the Coroner, dwindled into insignificant and unreliable facts. We think the appointment of a commission composed of mofussil police officers would be a reflection on Colonel Wilson, our energetic Police Commissioner and on the able force which he commands, and we feel certain that Government will not, unless they are fully satisfied about the inefficiency of our police, appoint a commission. [The Vártáhar (18), in its issue of the 7th, and the O Anglo Lusitano (158), in that of the 4th June, also disapprove of the verdict of the jury.]

26. The Kaiser-i-Hind (85), in its issue of the 7th June, writes:—The Coroner's jury has done wisely in looking at the whole case of the Rájábái Tower fatality as presented to it by the Coroner from a broad point of view. Who will deny that there was not ample circumstantiality in the evidence brought forward, in the absence of direct proof of Mánekji Asláji's intimate complicity, in conjunction with two unknown accomplices, to implicate him. We are convinced that only the hare-brained would dare say that there was not. The jury would have been wanting in vision and comprehension had it brought in an open verdict in the face of the facts disclosed. It has really rendered a service to the public and a service to the misguided police also. It has confirmed the public suspicion of Mánekji Asláji's direct complicity in the crime, and at once lifted the veil of the mystery in which the dual murder was hitherto supposed to be enwrapped. There may be minor threads of the mystery to be picked up, but we repeat, despite the blatant assertions of the apologists of the police to the contrary, that the principal incidents of the deaths have been cleared up. The public are now satisfied that there was neither an accident nor a suicide. The deaths entirely arose from the infamous attempts of Mánekji Asláji and his black accomplices to outrage the girls. So far the verdict is satisfactory and the public may rest and be thankful. Not that therefore the crime is avenged, or that the culprit already in custody may not escape judicial trial. But the first step towards such a trial proving not abortive is now taken. The police is bound now to discover the accomplices of Mánekji Asláji and find out the minor links which must carry the guilt home. It would be a shame and a disgrace to its detective reputation if after this verdict it failed to do so. It would be a shame and a disgrace to the local Government if it allowed the inquiry to be again misdirected, bungled and misinterpreted as it has hitherto been. If it allowed further evidence to evaporate or be evaporated or made non est, then the crime of having allowed the murderers to escape will have to be shared by it with the police. Thus has closed the second act of the tragedy. There yet remain the third and final acts which should bring retributive justice on the heads of those who have perpetrated the infamous crime of rapine and murder. May it be in the power of the local Government to avenge the cruel wrong, appease the indignation and allay the alarm of all right-minded persons who have been shocked and unnerved by this horrible tragedy!

What Government should do after the verdict of the Coroner's jury in the Rájábái Tower tragedy.

27. The same newspaper writes:—What next? That is the question which addresses itself to all classes of the community, now that the matter of the Rájábái Tower fatality has advanced a stage. The next step is, of course, a magisterial inquiry in which the police will have the entire responsibility of conducting the case. The relatives and friends of the deceased can have no locus standi. Mr. Craigie and Mr. Inverarity may be there to watch proceedings. But if fresh witnesses be not forthcoming to complete the chain of evidence, of what public advantage will be the magisterial investigation? We have seen that before the Coroner the police failed to track any evidence worth mentioning. Whatever evidence there was to enable the jury to return a verdict implicating Mánekji Asláji and some unknown persons, was brought by Mr. Craigie's clients. Now, if the same party are really to render effective assistance in attempting to bring to book the actual offenders, how are they to proceed? The present attitude of the police is entirely forbidding and discouraging. We appeal to the Public Prosecutor and the higher authorities to say whether after the deliberate opinion expressed by Mr. MacDermott at the close of the inquest, that he had no ground to suspect that there was any outrage and murder at all, it is at all possible for him and others to prosecute the inquiry further. And, if the police is so obstinate and defiant as to reject any further witnesses whom Mr. Craigie's clients may endeavour to bring, is it not certain that the magisterial inquiry must prove abortive and a public waste of time and energy besides? The whole matter, so far as we can view it at present, is brought to a dead impasse by the inexcusable conduct of the police. This aspect of the matter needs to be thoroughly considered by the Public Prosecutor and brought to the notice of the Government before any appearance is put in Mr. Cooper's Court. Are we to understand that because a couple of recalcitrant and headstrong policemen have taken into their heads, without showing any satisfactory cause for such an attitude, not to move as much as a single muscle towards the tracking out of the criminals, that therefore the matter should be allowed to die a natural death? Is this the state of affairs which the Government wishes? Is this the state of affairs with which the entire community of Bombay are likely to be satisfied? In short, is it, we may ask, the way to bring justice home to the offenders? If it be not, then, in the name of all that is just and honourable, we demand what is the Government going to do? Surely, it is not going to allow public indignation to rise to boiling point in this matter and force its hands? For the sake of its own reputation we deem it imperative that the Government should, without delay, consult its law officers as to what practical and effectual step should be taken to fully establish the guilt of the murder. There has been a rumour touching some commission which it is the intention of Government to nominate. Unless such a commission is charged with the immediate object above referred to, and unless the members composing it are men in whom the public can repose implicit confidence, it would be worse than useless to have such a commission. It may do more harm than good. We cannot approve some three names that have been pointed. They are utterly undesirable. But be that as it may, what the public demand is some immediate effectual action. In this connection the paramount question to be considered is whether the policemen now in charge are the right and proper persons to be entrusted with further investigation after what has happened at the Coroner's inquest? Delays are also dangerous, because each day that the matter hangs fire diminishes all chance of confirmatory evidence. It is, therefore, the solemn duty of Government to act decisively, expeditiously and with wisdom, so as to allay further popular alarm and indignation.

28. The Ilám Goftár (86), in its issue of the 7th June, writes:—In the face of a soul-stirring tragedy which still continues to agitate the public mind, it will not do for the Government to continue their silence. It would have been premature on their part to have taken any action before this. But after the verdict of the jury their intervention has become absolutely necessary in the interests of truth and justice. The police having all along stuck to a theory to which they had in a manner pledged themselves, they cannot now be expected to put forth honestly and conscientiously all their energy in discovering a clue to the crime. If they were set to work for it, they would be working against their will and against what appears to be their conviction. If Government hold the same view as the police, then their inaction will be proper. But if they are struck, as the public has been, with the strange attitude of the police, if they do not consider that those persons are either fools or knaves who refuse to acquiesce in the police theory, then it is their duty to appoint, without any loss of time, a committee of police officers of tried ability and experience, in whom the public may have the fullest confidence, with power to inquire into all the circumstances of the case. In order that Government may be moved to take prompt and sufficient measures it is now incumbent on the Pársi community to send a united representation to them. The sacred memory of the dead, as well as the general safety of the public, demand that there should be a full and impartial inquiry, embracing an investigation into the conduct of the police—that the men who are guilty of violence or murder shall not go free. The dead have paid with their lives a tribute to their noble womanhood,—a tribute so rare and so glorious as to exalt humanity itself. This is a tribute of which the Pársi community ought to be proud, even while it mourns. How they should cherish and preserve the memory of such a deed is a question of the future. Their present duty is to meet and represent to the powers what they think and feel—to show that money shall not be wanting to reward those who can give a clue to the detection of the criminals so that they may not escape their just doom. Now is the time for action, as now alone is the proper time for journalists to speak out on the merits of the case, the inquiry having been closed and a verdict given.

Comments on the conduct of the Bombay Police in the Rájábái Tower tragedy case.

29. The same newspaper writes :—After a patient and careful inquiry into the circumstances connected with the deaths of the two Pársi girls by a fall from the Rájábái Tower, the Coroner's jury have pronounced a deliberate verdict that the poor girls were the victims of attempted outrage to which Mánekji Asláji was privy, that one of them, Bachubái, threw herself from the top balcony of the tower in consequence of the attempt, and that the same Mánekji Asláji threw over the younger of the two, Pirojbái, in order to destroy the evidence of his complicity in the foul deed. The verdict has, in the main, been on the lines of the Coroner's summing up, and the summing up was as able as it was impartial, showing a correct grasp of the mass of conflicting evidence which the Coroner had to record for eighteen days, and which he sifted and analysed in a way that brought out all sides of the case clearly, forcibly and truthfully. Scarcely any point of importance escaped Dr. Blaney's keen and searching review of the evidence. He wisely refrained from any pronounced or positive opinion, leaving it to the jury to draw their own inferences and conclusions from the presentation to them of a lucid and honest weighing of the evidence. Whether Mánekji Asláji can be brought to the gallows on the strength of such evidence as has been tendered in the inquiry or not, there is no longer any room for the slightest doubt as to the cruel fate of the poor innocent girls. Most disgraceful surmises were made as to the deaths, and, what is worse, they were allowed to appear in print; but the verdict of the jury—a verdict perfectly in accordance with the weight of the evidence—has vindicated the memory of the poor girls, in spite of all that could be done by a strong and well-organized police to prop up the theory of suicide and to be-little, minimize and discredit the theory of outrage. Contrary to their usual plain duty, their bias, and the weight of probabilities in favour of the supposition of foul play, the police moved heaven and earth to prove that the theory which they had evolved from their inner consciousness, or from the omniscience of their soul, was the only theory to account for the falls. But the truth has forced itself out, in spite of the zealous endeavours of the police to stifle and smother it. They may not have consciously intended to shield a horrible crime. If they did so, they deserve to be ignominiously dismissed from the service. We have no proofs to impute any bad motive to them. Having recklessly committed themselves to a certain view, they may have tried all along to uphold it in sheer perverseness of spirit. They may have considered that it would injure their name and reputation to recede from a position once firmly taken up in the midst of a vehement outcry against it. But their action being most extraordinary, it naturally gave rise to suspicion. For, while the public was crying aloud that a crime had been committed, while the inherent probabilities of the case, apart from independent evidence, pointed to it, the police only shut their eyes and went to sleep. To some very pertinent questions put by the Coroner, Superintendent McDermott replied that even before a single night had passed over the tragedy, even before medical examination by the Coroner's Surgeon—and, it may be added, after the evidence of the two doctors who were positively of opinion that an outrage had been attempted upon the girls—he was convinced that there had been no foul play whatever, and acting upon that conviction he at once released Mánekji Asláji. It did not, at all events, appear from the way the police conducted themselves at the inquest that they were burning with desire to go about the right track. They frittered away their energy in taking sides at the inquest, in treating every witness whose evidence went at all against their own pet theory as a hostile witness, in putting all sorts of questions, ingenious and frivolous, to such witnesses, and, lastly, in indulging occasionally in frivolties, intended to be humorous, which in an inquiry full of such deep pathos and tragedy jarred and grated on the ear. The duty of the police in this sad business was plain from the beginning. Since the verdict of the jury, which has blown up their theory and at the same time the evidence of Dr. Smith, that duty has been rendered urgent and imperative. They can only perform it in one way. But after all that has been said and done, will they now perform it conscientiously and to the best of their power? [The Indian Spectator (2) of the 7th, the Sudhárak (17) of the 8th, and the Káthiáwár Times (3) of the 9th June also express similar sentiments.]

Disapproval of the remarks of the Times of India on the evidence placed before the Coroner's jury in the Rájábái Tower tragedy case.

30. The Rást Goftár (86), in its issue of the 7th June, writes:—Following the police, the Times of India is disposed to view with suspicion the evidence of those witnesses who volunteered to give it some weeks after the Rájábái Tower tragedy. We are not surprised at the suspicion of our contemporary. As an Englishman, the writer's ignorance of the fact that Natives generally—especially the more ignorant among them—go in mortal dread of the police, may be easily accounted for. Natives have exaggerated notions of the might and power of the police, and of their capacity to abuse that power. It is not to the purpose to inquire whether this view of the police is correct, or how far it is correct. We have only to see whether this is the fact. In the present inquiry it was noticed that the police had taken up what seems to be a hostile attitude towards a particular view, and therefore the reluctance of witnesses to come forward in support of that view is quite natural and intelligible. Expression was given to this terror of the police by a witness, Mr. Enti, when he appeared before the Coroner. His evidence is of great value and importance in the case. It was given in a straightforward manner, and we believe it in spite of the flat contradiction given to it by Mr. MacDermott. Although Mr. Enti came in late to give his evidence, we do not suppose that even the Times of India will cast suspicion upon it on that account, because within a day or two after the tragedy he communicated what he had seen, and the conversation which had passed between him, Mánekji Asláji and the Superintendent, to several gentlemen of position whose word even the police cannot dare, we think, to doubt. We can understand an Englishman's ignorance of the fear with which the police is regarded by ordinary Natives. But we cannot understand his complaint, which is an echo of what the police have stated, that the Pársi children had not been brought forward till a late stage of the inquiry. If the writer had observed the most extraordinary attitude of the police in this inquiry, it would have been clear to him that keeping back the children from the police influence admitted of an easy explanation. There is also a want of appreciation on his part of the evidence recorded by the Coroner and of the inherent probabilities in favour of the theory of outrage when he gravely opines that "although no motive is suggested this (suicide) is the easiest and, we might almost say, the most natural theory." Surely we shall not deny that suicide is by far the easiest theory for the police to maintain. But it is now authoritatively declared that it is not the correct theory, and it was never the most natural theory. While the Times of India has carefully noted and put together all that could possibly be said by an avowed advocate of the police, it sees nothing to condemn in the extraordinary conduct of the police, nor in the evidence of the Coroner's Surgeon, whose manner of examination of the dead bodies and whose opinion about the marks found upon them were justly condemned by a very able correspondent whose letters the Bombay Gazette had the fairness to publish. [The Kaiser-i-Hind (85) of the same date makes similar remarks.]

Criminal prosecution of the University Havildár and peon in charge of the Rájábái Tower for receiving money for giving admission to the building recommended in connection with the tower fatality.

31. The Jáme Jamshed (84), in its issue of the 10th June, says:—Several witnesses have stated on oath at the Coroner's inquest in the Rájábái Tower fatality case that they had to pay a reward to the Havildár and peon in charge of the tower for being admitted into the building, and it has been asserted by a Pársi young man named Mr. Reporter that an objectionable use was made of this building. It is therefore desirable that the Havildár and peon should be criminally prosecuted by the University authorities. If this is done, some new material evidence would very likely come to light in connection with the tower tragedy.

32. The Bombay Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 10th June, notices the telegram of the 5th idem from Bombay published in the Statesman of Calcutta, to the effect that in revenge of the report spread by the Pársis of Bombay that two Mahomedans were concerned in the Rájábái Tower fatality, the Mahomedans of this city have resolved to make an attack on the Pársis after saying their prayers in the Juma Masjid this day (Friday), that the intended attack is not likely to be made as the police is upon the alert, that angry feelings have been excited between the two communities, and that it is likely that very few Pársis will this day go to their callings. This telegram, observes the Samáchár, which was despatched by the Bombay correspondent of the Statesman, is both surprising and mysterious, and the police ought to obtain an explanation from the correspondent and place it before the public.

A telegram from Bombay to the Statesman of Calcutta in connection with the Rájábái Tower tragedy, stating that the Mahomedans of Bombay intend to make a wholesale attack on the Pársis.

33. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 7th June, says:—A citizen, who has no quarrel with the police, writes:—Terrorism prevails in Bombay. Men and women alike are afraid of going out in day-time. Robbers and murderers seem to be all-powerful. Strangely enough, the police is helpless to protect the lives and properties of the public for whose benefit it is supposed to exist. It is horrible that under the rule of the benign British Government in the first city in India, in spite of a once first class and efficient police now almost useless, within the sacred precincts of learning, in broad daylight and before the very eyes of justice, murders most foul and unnatural, outrage most inhuman, cowardly and cruel, on two innocent, happy and blooming girls should be allowed to be committed, and that the criminals should escape! The very idea is shocking. Does it not clearly show that the badmáshis seem to have no dread of the police? Does it not prove that this public place of resort must very often have been used by bad persons for immoral purposes, and that many women, not so courageous as those two who so heroically sacrificed their lives for their honour, the most precious jewel of a woman, may have silently tolerated the dishonour? It also proves the miscreants to be hard-hearted villains, not afraid to lay hands on women of respectability and honour. Surely, matters have now gone too far to demand the immediate attention of the authorities.

Alleged prevalence of terror in Bombay and the inefficiency of the local police.

34. In noticing the censure passed by Mr. Hamilton, the Second Presidency Magistrate, on Superintendent Grennan of the Bombay Police for not releasing on bail under Section 169 of the Criminal Procedure Code a Márwádi named Gaina Veena who was accused of theft, the Bombay Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 9th June, says:—It is a general complaint that police officers act high-handedly with the people, but the largest portion of those coming in contact with the police being poor and illiterate, they do not possess sufficient courage to oppose the wrong acts of the police. Even sensible persons are dissuaded from opposing the improper conduct of the police, because it is very powerful. Superintendent Grennan is one of the few police officers who are said to be religious and anxious to act justly; but since he has been found guilty of having twice made a careless use of his discretion, it is but meet that an inquiry should be made by the Commissioner of Police as to whether the mode of working followed by the Superintendent is very common with the other police officers; and if it be established that the officers under him work on objectionable lines, the Commissioner will, it is to be hoped, issue proper instructions to them.

An enquiry into the mode of working of the police officers in Bombay desired.

35. The Bakul (21), in its issue of the 7th June, says:—Last year two accused persons died in the Ratnágiri District while they were in the custody of the police for the purpose of making inquiries into the offences with which they were charged. One of the accused died while he was in charge of the police of the Devgad Táluka. The Superintendent of Police will be good enough to make minute inquiries into the causes of the two deaths.

A request to the Superintendent of Police, Ratnágiri District, in connection with the deaths of two accused persons while in police custody.

36. A correspondent of the Akhbáre Sodágar (91), in its issue of the 10th June, states:—A woman of the Halái Luhána caste recently died at Karáchi. It is rumoured that she was murdered and had several wounds by a knife on her person. The police does not seem to have made inquiries into this suspicious death, which ought to be duly inquired into.

A suspicious death at Karáchi.

37. The Gujarát Darpan (80), in its issue of the 7th June, disapproves of the practice of letting off fireworks at marriage and other processions while passing through the narrow and thickly populated streets and busy bazars of Surat, which frequently suffers from extensive conflagrations, and requests the Collector of Surat to put down the dangerous practice.

A request to put a stop to the practice of letting off fireworks in the streets of Surat at marriage and other processions.

38. The Bombay Samáchár (93) and the Jáme Jamshed (84), in their issues of the 13th June, briefly describe the overcrowding of Mahomedan pilgrims in passenger vessels, and their not getting sufficient and good food and water and the consequent heavy death-rate that prevails among these pilgrims, and exhort the Mahomedan community to represent this scandalous state of things to Government, assuring them that their representation will be supported by the reports made from time to time by the Port Health Officer, and that no difficulty will be found in obtaining redress of the grievances of the Hájis.

The grievances of Mahomedan pilgrims on board passenger vessels.

39. The A'rydvart (20), in its issue of the 6th June, says that there being extensive inter-communication between the people of the Khándesh District and those of the Indore State, the coin current in His Highness Holkar's State is largely imported into Khándesh. But the State coin not being current in the latter district much difficulty is experienced by the people in transacting business, and hence it is desirable that Indore coin should be declared current in Khándesh.

Difficulty experienced by the people of Khándesh owing to the coin of the Indore State not being current in that district.

40. The Rájyabhakta (116), in its issue of the 5th May, received on the 13th June, asserts that some of the prisoners in the Ahmedabad jail send letters through the jail peons to their relatives and obtain money, half of which is appropriated by the peons and from the remaining half opium, tobacco and other intoxicating drugs are supplied to the prisoners by these peons. The paper praises Mr. Premshankar, the jailor, for his honesty, but regrets that such laxity should prevail under him. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 9th June, makes the following suggestions to Government in connection with the management of the jail, which it condemns:—That the European and Native prisoners be treated alike; that better food, clothing and bedding than issued at present be given to the prisoners, and the contract system be abolished in order to do so; that the prisoners be allowed to perform religious ceremonies on their respective holidays; that better medical arrangements be made; that the salaries of the jail peons be increased, in order that they may not be tempted to ask bakshis or largess from prisoners, and that a better watch be kept on their behaviour. The Rájyabhakta suggests that old prisoners to whom the jailor may give a good character may be released on parol on the lines followed in the case of prisoners at the Andamans.

Complaints regarding the management of the Ahmedabad jail and suggestions in the matter.

41. The Satya Shodhak (60), in its issue of the 7th June, says:—It takes four days to carry the Bombay mail to Ratnágiri vid Chiplun in the rainy season. If the mail is taken vid Kolhápur it will reach Ratnágiri in half the time without entailing any additional expenditure. We request the postal authorities to favourably consider this suggestion, as its adoption will prove very advantageous to the people of Ratnágiri.

A request to the postal authorities regarding the conveyance of the Bombay mail to Ratnágiri.

PART II.—Education.

The Director of Public Instruction on physical exercise in schools.

42. The Phœnix (5), in its issue of the 3rd June, writes:—Our Director of Public Instruction has given us a note of warning. He has recently issued an order to his subordinates that gymnastics and school-games should be practised with moderation, that sickly boys should be excused and that the objections of parents against making physical exercise compulsory for their children should be attended to. In the promulgation of such an order we are afraid that the Director has unconsciously dealt a blow which will discountenance physical training and compel us to revert to the old order of things unless it be immediately modified. Who is to determine the physical condition of a child, and whose authority ought to be conclusive on the point as to whether the child is in a fit state for physical exercise? If this point is to be abandoned to the discretion of parents and they are to be the only judges in a matter in which nine out of ten would inevitably err, physical training might as well be banished from the schools; and this seems to be virtually the effect of the third paragraph of the resolution, which provides that in case of objections being made by parents they should be attended to. It is this paragraph to which we should strongly object. If a child be weak and delicate, although that weakness and delicacy should principally arise from a lack of physical exercise, parents would be loud in protesting against their children being compelled to undergo any physical training; and it is just these very children that require it the most. Neither would we maintain, on the other hand, that teachers should be the exclusive judges in determining as to whether a child is physically fit for active exercise, for it may happen, considering the number of pupils they have to attend to, that they err on the side of severity and force some who are really incapacitated to take part in games. What we think would be a safe mode of procedure in such matters of doubt and difficulty would be to procure a medical certificate from some independent experienced practitioner to testify to the physical condition of a child. Then and then only could those be exempted who really deserve exemption, without giving any opportunity for individual likes or dislikes. We will not deny that the Director of Public Instruction in issuing the order in question has been actuated by a laudable anxiety for the interests of students in general, but the terms of the order are such as will not, in our opinion, bring about the desired end. Every trivial and frivolous objection will be laid hold of by students to escape from the bugbear, as some imagine, of athletic games, and if their own objections do not prove of sufficient weight, the authority of the parents will be drawn in to supplement the deficiency. We are strongly of opinion, therefore, that the order needs some modification before it becomes a formidable weapon in the hands of parents.

PART III.—Municipalities.

The assurance given by Dr. Pollen about the keen interest taken by His Excellency Lord Harris in local self-government at Poona considered very gratifying.

43. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 7th June, says:—His Excellency Lord Harris will do well to remember that it is not with the people alone that the good conduct of a municipality rests. The officialdom is a powerful element in this connection, and if they wish it they can successfully defeat all the good aims of a municipality, as was already amply evidenced in the case of the Poona City Municipality. Under the circumstances we hail with joy the soothing message conveyed by Dr. Pollen, in the hope that Lord Harris will, in the words of Lord Dufferin, water the tender plant planted by Lord Ripon. In this connection the tendency now-a-days is to saddle the municipalities with various items of expenditure, particularly educational, sanitary, police and others. It is to be remembered, however, that mofussil municipalities in general are a poor lot that always find it difficult to make both the ends meet, and consequently they ought not to be charged beyond actual local needs. And if we remember aright, Lord Reay expressly laid it down in one of his speeches that no educational charge should be made on them, and we do believe that the principle so laid down is being now (not?) acted up to in all righteousness. We are thankful to Lord Harris for the assurance of the general interest he feels in municipal matters, but we should like His Lordship to study the question personally and not to look at it through the stained official spectacles.

Remarks in connection with the proposal for taking securities from a number of clerks and officers in the service of the Bombay Municipality.

44. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 11th June, writes :—Under the powers conferred by Section 81 (1) (a) of the Bombay City Municipal Act, steps are being taken to demand securities from a number of municipal officers and clerks. We have nothing to say against the principle on which securities are demanded. We are not going to question their utility. Our intention in taking up this subject is simply to point out to the Corporation that in preparing the schedule no attempt appears to be made to pursue a consistent and equitable policy. One who peruses it does not know what to say about it. For want of space we cannot place the whole of it before our readers. What we will therefore do is to point out some of the glaring omissions and hard cases. In preparing it the Commissioner himself seems to have felt some misgivings in the beginning. As a man of conscience he naturally thought that, while the minor officers and clerks had been marked out for securities, no provision had been made for demanding any from the heads of departments. The Chief Accountant, the Assessor and Collector, the Revenue and Refund Audit Officer, the Superintendent of Licenses, and also the Auditors, gave no securities, notwithstanding the fact that they held the most responsible offices! The Chief Accountant, no doubt, at present gives a security of Rs. 10,000, but that is not for the due discharge of his present duties: it is the old one he gave while a Deputy Accountant. He simply continues it. But afterthought seems to have led the Commissioner to give up this idea and to oppose any proposal to that effect. He thought that no security was necessary from heads of departments, on the principle that no pecuniary security can in their case at all approach in value in any way the security which the municipality derives from the consequences which their dismissal for misconduct would entail upon them. So he was pleased to think, and his opinion has been meekly endorsed by the Standing Committee. It resolved "that in the opinion of the Standing Committee it is not necessary that heads of departments should furnish security." A reference to the proceedings of the Standing Committee's meeting on the 21st ultimo will show that this motion, which was proposed by Mr. A. M. Dharamsi and was seconded by Mr. Mulji Bhawánidás Bárbháya, was passed without any discussion or a single dissentient voice. What an equitable policy! Here are officers holding responsible offices of trust,—officers who have the collection and disbursement of 60 lakhs of revenue, the direction of the affairs of the various loans worth krors, and the auditing of the finances,—let off without any security! The Assistant Assessors, too, are not required to give any, and yet registration clerks, for instance, having no connection with the collection and disbursement of revenue, but simply doing the duty of preparing the bills,—not framing them, but only filling the forms from schedule books and forwarding them for passing to their superiors,—and drawing petty salaries ranging from Rs. 15 to Rs. 50 a month, are to be called upon to furnish securities to the amount of Rs. 500! Is this not monstrous? Is there any principle in this? Is this fair? Will any Corporator have the moral courage to rise and question this most objectionable procedure? What are these poor clerks to do? Whence are they to procure the security? If they have no private resource, they must pay fees to the guaranteeing associations or companies and do the needful, or give up their posts. Have they any other course? Besides this, it must be borne in mind that positions are relative. If the loss of appointments for misconduct and the sad consequences proceeding therefrom be in the eyes of the municipality a sufficient security in the case of the high officers mentioned above, why is not the same consideration allowed force in the case of the petty inspectors and clerks? To them dismissal will carry direr consequences for having no other resources to fall upon; they will either have to beg or starve, and this though they hold no responsible posts. The higher officers thus exempted may swallow thousands and lakhs, and may, therefore, though dismissed, live in ease upon their ill-gotten gains. Of course, we are talking of hypothetical but not impossible cases. The Commissioner himself at first rated the responsibility of the position of the Chief Accountant, formerly called Controller, so high that he thought that in his case the security should be at least to the extent of half-a-lakh. The same may be said of the Assessor and the other exempted officers, and yet they are to be let off on a principle wrong on the very face of it, while poor registration clerks and several others drawing salaries so low as Rs. 15 a month are to give securities worth Rs. 500! In this way are the affairs managed in our municipality! Will the Corporation seriously look into this? We hope it will.

Remarks in connection with the alleged suspension of the Jambusar Municipality in the Broach District.

45. In alluding to the report that a resolution has been passed by Government suspending for two years the municipality of Jambusar, in the Broach District, and entrusting its work to a Government official for that period, the Bombay Samachár (93), in its issue of the 11th June, says:—It is not known for what reasons this municipality has been visited with the punishment of suspension. There are no elected members in this corporation, which is entirely made up of members nominated by Government. It is an interesting question, therefore, what reason should have been given by these nominees to dissatisfy Government? The report on the last year's municipal administration in this presidency recently published is likely to furnish some explanation on the subject. Pressure was brought to bear upon all municipalities, irrespective of their financial status, to undertake the execution of drainage and water works, and when the plea of the inability of a corporation to meet the expenses of such costly works was advanced, the corporators were told that they should either enhance the existing house-tax or impose a new one. When the nominated corporators, who are well acquainted with the actual condition of the rate-payers of such poor towns as Jambusar, refuse to adopt the proferred advice for imposing a house-tax, they are denounced by Government as incompetent to carry on the work of local self-government. Since the Jambusar municipal commissioners have, in spite of the treatment received by the Mehmadabad Municipality at the hands of Government, refused to adopt the advice of Government, it shows that this corporation is unable to incur the heavy expenditure desired by Government, and hence the refusal of the commissioners to undertake the heavy responsibility.

Alleged mismanagement of the Wái Municipality.

46. The Vrittasár (75) of Wái, in its issue of the 8th June, says:—The local municipality is suffering pecuniary loss owing to mismanagement at the toll-gate. Complaints have reached us that suits are filed against defaulters of house and halálkhor taxes without serving notices on them for the default. It is not just that the rate-payers should be thus unnecessarily harassed.

Part IV.—Native States.

Appointment of Natives to command bodies of cavalry maintained by Native Chiefs for imperial service repommended.

47. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 7th June, writes;—In our own presidency three Native States of Káthiáwár, Bhávnagar, Navánagar and Junágad, have promised to maintain bodies of cavalry for imperial service. Káthiáwár is celebrated for its horses, and these three States are comparatively better placed to supply cavalry than any of their neighbours. In this connection the most delicate point is that of command, and that in the words of the Bombay Gazette seems to be solved in a half-hearted spirit in this wise: The scheme, in addition to giving the States participating in it an opportunity of loyally assisting the paramount power, will open a career to Rajputs and others of good birth, who by tradition and instinct are fitted for military service and for whom it is of the first importance that some honourable occupation should be provided. It is to be hoped, therefore, that nothing will arise to interfere with its smooth and successful working. It however appears that the headship or command of the army will vest in the States, so far as its maintenance alone is concerned, and not beyond. If this be the real significance of the sentence above, we regret Government should not be prepared to requite the spirit in which offers for imperial defence were made a few years ago. We may assure them that knots of small troops entirely under Native command will be a tower of strength in the British army, as had been the case during the Mahomedan rule, but this latitude of freedom does not seem to find favour, and this spirit of uncompromising suspicion is not calculated to make the service either popular or honourable among the people, and to encourage them to deeds of bravery. British statesmen profess "the love of the Indian people" as the very basis of their rule in this country, but the half-hearted spirit in which these offers are availed of makes clear the difference between saying and doing. Why this spirit of suspicion should be allowed to reign is not very clear, even though Government knows that the fate of Native States is bound up with the British rule; remove that rule and all Native States will be nowhere.

Approval of the Government resolution on the hospitalities of Native States to the political officers in charge of them.

48. The Gujarátí (81), in its issue of the 7th June, says:—For years past the Native press has been complaining of the frequent demands made by some political officers upon the generous hospitality of Native princes, and in some instances, it is rumoured, the tax upon the liberality of the Darbárs had become so intolerable that many will welcome with pleasure the recent circular issued by Government forbidding the continuance of the old practice in future. Native princes also will hail these instructions with a sense of relief. We are prepared to admit that in some instances the profuse hospitality of the Native princes was the outcome of generous instincts and in others of politic considerations. At the same time what was formerly a mere matter of choice and discretion grew into an imperative custom, the violation of which made Native rulers not a little uncomfortable sometimes. It was not always that political officers were as self-denying as the late Colonel West, and, so far at least as the Government are concerned, they have made their views known. How far they will be practically carried out remains to be seen. Most of the ruling puppets are such timid and ignorant creatures that even a whisper is enough to bully them into doing anything for pleasing the omnipotent Sáheb. Very likely political officers will endeavour to keep within the lines of the instructions contained in the circular, and we expect that Native princes also will have enough of manly sense in them not to hold out temptations to the former to disregard the rules now authoritatively laid down by Government.

49. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 11th June, writes:—A very important circular has just been issued by the Political Department of the Bombay Government. Whatever the reasons that must have prompted its promulgation just at this period, official responsibility to act up to its spirit is a true index of the strong desire of the Government that its officers should be above all suspicion, and that no temptation, howsoever trivial, should be allowed to come in their way while discharging their official functions. It is quite apparent that the motive with which the circular is issued is to discourage both the presentation and acceptance of presents by any parties. Where officials are on friendly terms with the Native Chiefs, or other nobility or gentry, it is quite natural that one party is anxious to oblige the other in a variety of ways, say by looking to the comforts of officials on the one part, or by the acceptance of them on the other in the course of a friendly relationship; but even such relations Government does not wish to encourage, on the ground that so long as human nature is what it is, possibly these relations may, even though unconsciously, influence the feelings of officials in connection with those in whose friendly contact they often come. An attempt has been made to blunt the edge of this stringency by the suggestion that the "receipt of the offerings of fruits and flowers, where such offerings cannot be rejected without causing offence," might be allowed. Eastern manners and customs do admit of the practice of such offers, but then it is the province of Government to see how far such acceptance may or may not be reasonable. Government lays great stress on the payment of proper charges for goods received. It says that where an officer must "depend on the assistance of the Darbár for his supplies, he must request the Darbár to appoint dealers from whom the articles required can be procured for proper payment." Obviously the injunction contained in the above is applicable not only to political officers in Native States, but to Government officials in British territories also. In British India dealers are paid for the supplies given to the officials on circuit, but then if the latter were to make private inquiries in the matter, they would learn to their surprise that all the money that goes out of their pockets does not always find its way to the coffers of the dealers. Often the Khánsama or the butler is too grasping, and the dealer has no easy access to the mofussil Huzur. The result may thus be easily imagined. We do not mean to cast a slur upon anybody; our object is simply to impress upon their minds the supreme necessity of vigilance in these matters upon their underlings. In the last part of the circular Government calls upon Native States not to regard such prohibition as a sign of discourtesy to them, but to help it in the full enforcement of the said circular even in their own territories. Thus the attitude of Government in this matter is highly commendable, and we have every hope that not only the revenue and other officers and politicals, but even Native States will heartily join in a matter calculated not only to conduce to the good governance of a territory, but to place all mutual relations above the shadow of merest suspicion. Government have done their part in the full light of their administrative responsibilities, and the only thing that now remains to be seen is how far both the officials and the public help their rulers in the maintenance of a high tone of official morality which it seems to have so much at heart.

50. The Káthiáwár Times (3), in its issue of the 10th June, states:—It is understood that after the disbandment of the 24th Regiment, Native Infantry, at present located here, only a wing of a Native Infantry will form the entire garrison. We do not know how far this is correct; but should it be so, it would be, we are afraid, a very short-sighted policy on the part of the military authorities to remove from here what little garrison we have. With the instance of Manipur fresh before us it is very necessary that we should keep ourselves wide awake. Without implying the least disparagement to any of the States of this province, we must say that some of them are often found unequal to the occasion in maintaining peace in their dominions in case of a strong outbreak of outlawry, and have to depend entirely on the British police and troops for the protection of life and property. In the face of such a hard fact it is quite a mystery to us how British Government can depend on the tag-rag and bob-tail Native State troops. Are the military authorities satisfied that in the hour of need we can safely rely upon such troops? We not only strongly object to the removal of the British troops from here, but, on the contrary, earnestly recommend Government to strengthen the garrison both by cavalry and infantry as much as possible, for Rájkot is the head-quarters of the Káthiáwár Agency and is the most central station. The Political Agent should point out to Government the necessity for strengthening the garrison. To remove the garrison from here on the score of economy or as a stroke of diplomatic policy will be, we fear, a most misguided act. We do not think the present garrison is adequate. It must be strengthened.

Alleged brutal murder committed at Ujjein in the Gwalior State by a Police Superintendent in the service of the Indore State.

51. The Mahratta (4), in its issue of the 7th June, writes:—We sympathise with the Mahárája Holkar. He has so many enemies surrounding him on all sides—not the least important and malignant of these being such as call themselves his friends, and yet by their acts most unconsciously do the Mahárája a grievously bad turn. Acts of brutality are reported from those quarters with an alarming regularity. The Mahárája is above all just, and punishes wrong-doers in rather too exemplary a fashion, and even this is turned and twisted against him and dark hints are thrown out about the necessity of a Commission of Inquiry being appointed, &c. All this is very unfortunate for the Mahárája. As an instance of how the Mahárája's servants manage to create embarrassing situations for him we may cite the case of Balvant Váman Booti, which is said to have created quite a sensation in those parts. The paper then relates the story of an alleged brutal murder of the above-mentioned gentleman reported from the Kesari (42) at paragraph 44 of the last Weekly Report, and observes:—The particulars of this case, though not full, are yet sufficient to give an idea of how great a sensation the incident must have created. We hope His Highness Mahárája Holkar will cause fullest inquiry to be made into the matter by independent persons.

A Press Act in the Hyderabad State.

52. The Bombay Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 13th June, states that a Press Act has been introduced by His Highness the Nizám into his State, that the proprietors and printers of vernacular newspapers in that State have been made to sign a binding to the effect that they would not publish any matter exciting the feelings of the people against either the British Indian Government or the Nizám's administration, or inciting quarrels between two communities professing different religions, or creating fear to a Government officer of suffering a loss, and that if any such writing were published the newspaper publishing the same would be suppressed and visited with other punishments provided by the law of the State.

The Thákor of Bhávnagar praised for desiring the application of the Age of Consent and Gambling Acts and applying other salutary laws to his State.

53. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 8th June, praises His Highness the Thákor of Bhávnagar for issuing orders to frame a law similar to the Age of Consent Act and a Gambling Act, in which provision will be made for making rain speculation unlawful and punishable, for introduction into his State, observing that this State has been foremost in adopting salutary laws from the British Indian Code, and exhorts the other Native States of this presidency to follow in the footsteps of Bhávnagar in this matter.

Remarks on the reply from Colonel Hancock, Acting Political Agent, Káthiáwár, to the Managing Committee of the Shetrunja temples in connection with his visit to the Shetrunja Hill.

54. The Gujarát Mitrá (82), in its issue of the 7th June, observes that the reply given to the Managing Committee of the Shetrunja temples by Colonel Hancock, Acting Political Agent, Káthiáwár, in connection with his visit to the Shetrunja Hill in the Pálitána State, is skilfully couched in general terms, and advises the Jains not to take further steps in the matter and to put up boards at different localities on the hill for the guidance of visitors, supplying the custodian of the hill with copies of an English translation of the rules and asking him to give a copy of it to each visitor. The Mitrá adds that if Government officials do not like to respect the superstitious customs of the Natives such as taking off shoes, they should not visit their sacred places, otherwise a misunderstanding might arise between them and the illiterate orthodox people, leading to serious consequences.

55. The Rájyabhakta (116), in its issue of the 9th June, has heard that the Jain community throughout India has been greatly distressed by Colonel Hancock and Mr. Cooke walking over certain prohibited places with their boots on and taking their dog with them, and that some of the Jamindárs of Bengal were prepared to criminally prosecute these officers at their own expense, but they have been advised by the Managing Committee of the Shetrunja temples not to take the extreme step as it believes that Colonel Hancock will give satisfactory explanation. The Rájyabhakta advises the Jains to treat Colonel Hancock's reply in the light of an apology, but asks Government to take severe notice of the officers' conduct by issuing a resolution publicly censuring them for the satisfaction of the masses who consider that their religion has been insulted.

A highway robbery between Bagasra and Hadála, in Sorath Pránt under the Káthiáwár Agency, and a request to the authorities in the matter.

56. A correspondent of the same newspaper observes:—On the 14th May last the passengers of two bullock-carts that were proceeding from the Kukawáo Station to Bagasra, in Sorath Pránt under the Káthiáwár Agency, were attacked and robbed between Bagasra and Hadála by three horsemen, who carried away valuables worth Rs. 1,000. Enquiries into this highway robbery were commenced by the police but have been left incomplete and the robbers have not been yet arrested. This road is much infested by highwaymen and a police station ought to be located on it.

57. The Akhbáre Soddgar (91), in its issue of the 9th June, states that about twelve days ago a cartman, by caste Ghánchi, who had with him Rs. 10 and was returning to the town of Muli in Jhálávád, Káthiáwár Agency (?), was, it is said, robbed and murdered by some thieves near that town, that the corpse was put into the cart and the murderers decamped, and that if this report be true the police ought to trace the offenders and get them duly punished.

Alleged murder of a cartman near Muli in Jhálávád, Káthiáwár Agency (?).

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

1. The Káthiáwár Times (3), in its issue of the 16th June, writes:—The resolution of Sir Auckland Colvin, Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West Provinces, on the recent Benares riot is very disappointing. The facts have not been carefully sifted, and the entire resolution seems to be characterized by indecision and indifference. What is most objectionable as regards the issue of the resolution is the unseemly hurry with which it was issued. Did it never occur to so experienced an administrator as Sir Auckland that, as the judiciary was under the orders of the Executive Government and as there was risk of its being influenced and prejudiced, he should wait till the final disposal of the riot-cases? After their decision Government would have been in a better position to form an opinion and to come to a decision of their own. Sir Auckland takes the citizens of Benares to task for not having employed constitutional means to remedy their grievances. We do not understand what Sir Auckland means by this, when meetings were held to protest against the demolition of the temple and when petitions were sent to the Magistrate, the Commissioner, the Lieutenant-Governor and the Viceroy. It appears that Sir Auckland himself with the assistance of two Engineers sanctioned the arrangement which was considered a direct outrage on the religion of the ruled. This Sir Auckland seems to admit in the resolution; but he attempts to explain it away by saying that he "desired that arrangement should be come to with those interested in the temple; and was informed that in this there would be no difficulty." It seems that His Honor was assured by parties other than the right ones that there would be no difficulty in coming to an arrangement regarding the temple. Of what use could such an assurance be? The assurance of the people who were directly concerned in the matter was necessary. The resolution does not state why this particular site was selected for the pumping station. It appears that a better place was available from where purer water could be had, but nobody cared to inquire about it. Sir Auckland cannot plead ignorance of the state of popular feeling on the subject, for he admits that he learnt from an extract in a vernacular paper that "owing to the establishment of the pumping station of the Benares Water-works at Bhadaini, the fate of the temple situated there caused great anxiety to the Natives." What steps did His Honor take to allay this anxiety of the people? He simply forwarded the extract to the Commissioner of Benares for report. A few days later His Honor's attention was again drawn to the subject by a petition from the Ráni of Barhár, praying that orders might be issued prohibiting the demolition of the temple. After keeping the petition for a week he sent it on to the Commissioner for "early report." This "early report" the Commissioner did not submit for more than a month. The Commissioner's report was to the effect that Mr. White, the Magistrate of Benares, had assured him that the image in question could be removed from the temple without hurting the religious feelings of the Hindus and that his authority was Rája Shiva Prasád. Mr. White, a Christian, and Rája Shiva Prasád, a Jaina, cannot be regarded as proper authorities to be consulted in this matter. It was the clear duty of the Commissioner to call together the leading men who worshipped at the temple and to learn their views. It appears that for a third time the attention of Sir Auckland was drawn by a petition from the Secretary to the Temple Protection Society. If all these are not constitutional means, we should like to know what Sir Auckland means by 'constitutional means.' After failing in all their endeavours to get redress from the local authorities the people naturally turned to the Viceroy. They sent the following telegram to the Private Secretary: "Popular Hindu feelings of the sacred city are greatly excited and alarmed by the authorities' interference with the temple of Rámji at Bhadaini. You will kindly move His Excellency to pass such orders to the local authorities as are urgently needed. Full particulars of the repeated protestations from the 18th October last to the authorities from the lowest to the highest will follow in memorial. Solicits orders for immediate postponement of further interference until final decision." To this the Viceroy replied that no representation to the Government of India should be submitted except through the local Government. In doing so the Viceroy might have been justified, but should not the Lieutenant-Governor have been instructed to take adequate measures for the safety of the temple and to allay popular excitement? All that the Lieutenant-Governor had to do was to give an assurance to the people that no harm would befall the temple. It is very bad for responsible officers of Government to turn a deaf ear to representations from the public. In this case, as in that of Manipur, there seems to have been much fearful bungling. Government officials through their short-sighted policy often force the people to desperation and bring discredit on Government. We are glad that the rioters, though their case deserved a very lenient punishment, have been punished; and we should be glad to see those through whose incompetence the riot was brought about likewise punished. Christian England demands that the affairs of all her subjects should be conducted on principles of honour and humanity and not on those of cynical disregard.

The recent Benares riots and their causes.

2. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 14th June, writes:—We are really at a loss to see why the Benares riot cases have been given such a terrible character. The so-called riots were a purely local disturbance due to purely local causes; but the proceedings of the cases and the comments of some of the newspapers thereon justify a belief that there might be something behind, and it is for this suspected something that the public at large should interest itself in these cases and make a united effort at sifting the whole affair with a view to bring truth to light. We can have little sympathy with individuals. But when we find that each individual case has something in it affecting the general welfare of the public, we certainly cannot sit with our arms folded, our mouths pinned, and our eyes shut. Happen what may, we must fight for truth and justice—fight for the Government and for the people—and it is in this light that we take up this question of riots in the different parts of the country as a whole. Many of these riots are attributed to religious fanaticism, as they call it, and repressive measures are adopted to crush the so-called religious fanaticism. 'Reformer' organs are endeavouring to support this policy and uphold the action of the authorities, and it is an open secret that, if possible, they would have it believed that the Age of Consent agitation has much to do with these riots. We must enter as strong a protest as we can against such a connection being established or even suggested. But beyond that we do not like to go, because we believe such insinuation to be silly and undeserving of notice. But we cannot help giving a warning to Government while it is not too late. The attempt to connect the Age of Consent agitation with the several riots is another silly and mischievous attempt at misleading Government and putting them on a wrong track altogether. It is an obvious truth that though a single unjust or oppressive act may lead to an outburst and may be described to be the cause of such an outpouring of people's feelings, it is simply impossible that the feelings of the people should ever assume that dangerous form unless, preceding the last act, there is a regular train of similar acts which have wounded the feelings of the people on each occasion. To us it is no matter for surprise at all that religious riots are now becoming more frequent. They are the results of the unreal religious neutrality principle, and the longer this false plea is urged the greater will be the encouragement given to such riotous risings. Government by holding to its principle of religious neutrality is giving encouragement to the work of the more pushing of religious enthusiasts. The indirect encouragement which is given to the propagation of the gospel is bringing into existence and encouraging the growth of conflicting religious elements, and when those grow sufficiently strong it would be impossible to prevent them from fighting. The example of Christian missionaries making endeavours at spreading Christianity have induced the followers of Islam to appoint their own missionaries to carry home to the doors of people of other sects the truths of their Kurán. The Hindu religion has always been exclusive and unaggressive. But even in this community a class of people has arisen which would make Hinduism inclusive and aggressive. This is the class of the Samájists. We have Samáj missionaries. The followers of Gautama have their own preachers, who are fast taking to travelling and preaching. Thus we have four different conflicting elements living and growing together—the direct results of the so-called policy of religious neutrality, and yet we expect that there should be harmony and peace between them all. We are, in fact, asked to manage matters in a way that will make it possible to make fire and water be together. In the resolution which the Government of the North-West Provinces published on the subject of the Benares riots, we find perhaps the best illustration of this. In a portion of the resolution the Lieutenant-Governor says: "The Government is always prepared to give due consideration to the religious feelings of the Hindus"; and in the same breath it says that it appears doubtful whether according to the requirements of the Hindu faith the idol is immoveable. This is just the Consent Act story. The Act would not in the slightest degree violate the religious feelings of anybody; but if it did, religion must give way to morality, of course as understood by those who hold the power. Whatever religion it may be, the religion as interpreted to Government and understood by them almost always differs from that interpreted to and understood by those who follow it. Hindus interpret their Shástras in a particular way, the official interpretation of them is different, and the same is the case with the Kurán. When they have an occasion to do so, Government follow their own interpretation, set the feelings of the people at defiance, and yet we are called upon to admit that Government are prepared to respect our religious feelings. One might exclaim with the sage: 'As rulers you may claim to govern my physical body, but my mind you can never govern.' Yes, if Government say we cannot assemble in a public meeting and declare that Government have misinterpreted our feelings, they can well prevent us from doing so. But no amount of physical force will prevent us from thinking so. We do feel differently, and when repeated acts of misinterpretation and disrespect of popular feelings intensify the grievance, such feelings cannot but find expression, and if any such outbursts are to be prevented, public opinion ought to be more scrupulously respected. Immediately we come to this we come to a very touchy question. The Benares riots, however, suggest the solution. In giving an account as to how the resolution of the Municipal Board was arrived at, our contemporary of the Indian Mirror tells us that the resolution was carried by a majority of 6 to 1. Out of the majority who voted for it 2 were Europeans and 4 Mahomedans. The two Hindus who voted for the proposition were, according to the Indian Mirror, gentlemen who cannot be expected to vote against any proposition of the Government Executive. As against this there were hundreds and thousands of people against the resolution. Here, too, we have the Age of Consent story again. That the handful of men who supported the idea of demolition do not make the real public opinion of the place is evident on its very face. We are told Rája Shiva Prasád gave Government to understand that the idol was moveable. It must be borne in mind that the Rája is himself a Jain. Thus, as in the Consent Bill, the advice of those entitled to give it was cast to the winds and those who gave convenient advice were listened to. If Lord Lansdowne has not been able to leave any other impression on the administration, he has certainly taught heads of Government how dissatisfaction and discontent can be most successfully created and kept up. Now, the Satrap of the North-West Provinces argues that the conduct of the malcontents was not constitutional. We fail to see how it could be constitutional. It is only when constitutional means fail that the argument of the club comes to be used by the mob of illiterate and generally uneducated people. It can be pointed out on the side of the people of Benares that just as they ought to have waited until the day of the next meeting came, why should the President not have introduced the question as a question of urgency? In a municipal town where the people voluntarily contribute large sums of money for sanitary work in addition to the usual taxation, it is simply idle to say that leading people can be found to obstruct works of improvement and even to go to the length of encouraging or actively helping a riot. We can quite realise how this comes to pass. The tale-tellers of the city, and, let us say, the angelic advisers of district officers, carry tales and poison the minds of the authorities against those gentlemen in the city who have the brain and the power to lead public movements, and the officials then await an opportunity and see if they can haul up such men and damn their reputation. In this honourable work the reform-wallahs in these days could render much help. The tale-tellers do their part of the business by speaking to the Sáb loques and the Sudhárani-wallahs do similar service by writing against these persons in any way they like. The Sáb is innocent and does not know how matters really stand: he takes his informant on his faith, his information having been corroborated by the paper, and when sufficient material to pluck out the thorns in their sides is ready, off goes the scheme and honest, respectable, loyal persons are blown off into a miserable life. We are quite prepared to believe that the Sáb loques might be quite innocent of what passes in the kitchen where these worthy plots against popular leaders are hatched; but we are unwilling to believe that those who thus mislead the Sábs are equally innocent. We regret to note that the mischief-mongers in the different cities are being made friends of by the reformers and that the columns of reform organs are being misused. Of course, we know our Sudhárak friends best, and their mischief will only be short-lived. But in the meantime Government will have suffered immensely. So far as the Benares riots are concerned, the people have already commenced to say that the punishments meted out owe their ghastly nature to something more than the nature of the offence. The trying Judge, it was publicly said, was biased, and the Government of Sir Auckland Colvin acted very kindly, indeed, in not having taken care to protect the reputation of the Benares Magistrate. Under the British rule, if we have more faith on the working of one department rather than upon another, it is the Judicial Department, and we hope the High Court of the province will interfere and set things aright. Sir Auckland Colvin is credited with having a sincere regard for public opinion, and so far as the Benares riot cases are concerned we think Sir Auckland's Government is on its trial. Failing to find justice here, we suggest that Parliament should be moved to take notice of the proceedings. In conclusion, let us hope that our Sudhárak friends will mend their ways and Government will do the public justice if they endeavour to find for themselves whose advice—of the Sudhárakas or of the loyal masses—it is safe to follow. Lord Lansdowne's Government already stands discredited in the eyes of the English nation and here is the best opportunity for him to regain his reputation.

3. The same newspaper writes:—Recent events have evidently disturbed the equanimity of the Government. The fiat has gone forth, says the Indian Mirror, that the number of volunteers is to be increased throughout the country and the police are to carry arms. If the Government allowed respectable Natives to form volunteer corps and took in hand first the reform of the police, making the personnel more worthy of the important duties they have to perform, we shall have nothing to say to the step taken by Government. But, unfortunately, Government does not seem inclined to do anything of the kind. Public opinion, so far as it has been focussed, has declared that in both these matters Government should change its policy of apathy. Nothing injures the cause of the Government so much as the conviction of the people that they are not trusted and the conduct of Government is strengthening the conviction. When the people find that they are not trusted, can we wonder if they gradually cease to feel much interest in the safety of the Government? We do not fear that the loyalty of the people will ever perish. What we are afraid of is that it may cease to be an active feeling. The police are everywhere looked upon with distrust and often with positive terror. Government has entrusted them with considerable powers and often these powers are abused. Person and property are tolerably safe, but no thanks are due to the police for it. They, by their imbecility, are doing their best to encourage wrongdoers, and in many cases we find them actually co-operating with them. This is a disgraceful state of things, and the sooner the Government remedies it the better for it and its subjects.

Remarks on the rumour, which is said to have its origin in the recent events, regarding increase in the number of volunteers and the permission to the police to carry arms.

4. The Subodh Patrika (17), in its issue of the 14th June, writes:—It is difficult to understand why Government officials should think of reviving the old Cotton Frauds Act and even of moving Chambers of Commerce to ask Government to do so. Adulteration of cotton is a subject in which the English consumers of the article are, it would seem,

Disapproval of the attempts of Government officials to revive the old Cotton Frauds Act, greatly interested, and in the opinion of the Commissioner of the Northern Division the Government, as the landlords of the soil, are concerned to see that the rayats do not mix local and foreign seed in the growing of cotton. To say the least, it is a hitherto unheard-of right of the landlord to control the operations of his tenants, and is hardly likely to meet with approval anywhere outside the official world.

Remark made by the Secretary of State for India about improper use being made of liberty of the press by the Native press in India commented on.

5. In noticing the remark made by Lord Cross, Secretary of State for India, that the freedom of the press was carried to great lengths in India by the Native press, the Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 16th June, observes:—This opinion of the Secretary of State is evidently founded upon information supplied to him by the Government of India, which necessarily must be or rather is of the same opinion, and confirms the report that prevailed some time ago that Government wished to check the reckless writings of the vernacular newspapers, but had given up their intention. It was understood that it was the intention of Government to place the Native press under restraint by enacting certain rules, and this had raised the fear that both the respectable as well as the disreputable portions of the press would be subjected to equal restraint. Government appear to have been dissuaded from taking this course by the inveterate dislike of the English people to gag the press. The observation made by Lord Cross that it was better that Native discontent should find an outlet than smoulder, shows more the inability of the authorities to cure the evil than political wisdom. If Government really consider that the freedom of the press is carried to great lengths and fear evil consequences proceeding therefrom, are there no means to remove the danger, and if there be any, why do not Government use them?

6. The same, in its issue of the 17th June, says:—There can be no doubt that a certain portion of the Native press publishes improper writings and puts Government in confusion. It possesses power to unsettle the minds of the people by putting forth careless and vehement effusions, and this power is used in connection with Native States and other matters and the high name of the press is lowered. The discreet portion of the public as well as Government know that this conduct of the press produces a serious evil that needs to be cured in the interest of Government as well as the people. It is, however, to be regretted that Government should not possess sufficient information about the press, and should on account of its carelessness on the subject allow the interests of the people as well as of itself to be injured. The only cure it thinks of is to gag the vernacular press and is dissuaded from adopting it by a fear of English public opinion. Government, however, has to thank itself for putting itself in this undesirable position.

A suggestion to Government for stopping agitation against the Age of Consent Act.

7. The Bhámini Prakásh (24), in its issue of the 10th June, says that the Shri Shivájí (64), the Poona Vaibhav (54) and the Vártáhar (19) newspapers have been publishing articles and dramas condemning the Age of Consent Act, but no notice seems to have been taken by Government of this, although these productions are such as would create a misunderstanding in the public mind about the Act. These newspapers, adds the Prakásh, should be strictly prohibited from writing against the Act. Government should also prevent the performance on the stage at Poona of the drama against the Act which has appeared in the Shri Shivájí newspaper, and see that the students of the Medical Class at Poona who receive Government scholarships are warned against taking part in the dramatic performance if it should happen to be given, and that in the event of their disobedience they are turned out of the class.

Government resolution on the Rájábái Tower tragedy considered satisfactory and the Pársis advised not to hold a public meeting at this stage of the proceedings.

8. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 15th June, writes:—The Rájábái Tower tragedy has reached its second stage. Mánekji Aláji was placed before Mr. Cooper, Chief Presidency Magistrate, on Saturday last on a charge of murder. Once put on its career of a judicial enquiry, the case is in no danger of being stifled. It will run its smooth course and have a full and fair opportunity for a thorough examination. The Government has taken official notice of the case by issuing a special resolution dealing with some of its aspects and explaining why a reward could not be offered at this stage. A special commission of police officers is further appointed to assist the investigation. The public has thus every reason to be satisfied that there will be nothing lacking on the part of the Government to make the enquiry thorough. There seems to be an uneasy feeling in some quarters, which we believe is quite unfounded, that the police have put themselves in a position of antagonism to the enquiry and that they do their work half-heartedly, if not with absolute hostility. We have always thought such a feeling unreasonable, but whatever the basis of the feeling, it ought to be set at rest by the measures now taken by the Government. Some Pársi gentlemen have issued a requisition for a public meeting. We should deprecate a public meeting being held at this time. Government has shown itself fully sensible of its responsibility, and a public meeting cannot make that sense livelier. On the other hand, with the unfriendly and distrustful feeling entertained by some persons towards the police, there is a risk of hot and unpleasant words being spoken. For our part, therefore, we should wish the meeting not held at all, or put off until the angry feeling may subside. In any case, if a meeting is to be held it should not be confined to one community. The offence, if there is one, was committed against the whole public and not in respect to the particular community alone to which the sufferers belonged, and if a public meeting is to be held, it is right that the entire public, or at least the Native public, should be represented in it.

9. In noticing the same resolution of Government the Gujarát Mitrá (83), in its issue of the 14th June, expresses approval of the refusal of Government to offer a reward for the detection of the alleged criminals at this stage of the case, however observing that the police have not properly exerted themselves in the matter, and says that the time has not arrived for holding a public meeting to memorialise Government on the subject.

10. The Káthiáwár Times (3), in its issue of the 13th June, writes:—We felt sure that Government would speak out after the verdict of the Coroner's jury in the Rájábái Tower fatality. They have done so and we have to thank them. Our only regret is that at the preliminary stage of the enquiry Government should not have reminded the police of the extraordinary efforts required from them to clear up the mystery. As long as Sir Raymond West has charge of the judicial portfolio the public may rest assured that the cause of justice will never suffer. As this is a case in which many knotty questions of law and legal technicalities are likely to arise, it is to be hoped that Sir Raymond will kindly keep a careful watch over it.

The Government of Bombay thanked for issuing the resolution on the Rájábái Tower tragedy.

11. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 14th June, writes:—As it is, the resolution of Government on the subject of the offer of a reward for such information as will lead to the apprehension and conviction of the offenders in the Rájábái Tower murder case does not seem to be very disappointing. It is hard to trace in it a desire on the part of the Government to mince matters or shirk its own share of responsibility in the affair, though we wish it had now warmed itself to action instead of assuming a position of self-complacency and placidity, thinking that the time is not yet ripe for the higher authorities to intervene. We are told that the practice followed in England by Home Secretaries and endorsed by Parliament is one of not giving large rewards in cases of serious crime, for they are productive of but ineffectual and mischievous results; that rewards lead to no practical result beyond satisfying a public demand for conspicuous action; and that they operate prejudicially by relaxing the exertions of the police. In some cases these may seem to be cogent reasons; but there are cases and cases, and we are inclined to think that when the circumstances of a particular case demand it, the offer of a reward must not be deemed out of the question. The existence of such circumstances in the tower affair cannot be denied, for the proceedings in the Coroner's Court have made it quite clear that the police shelved all inquiry the very next day after the occurrence, thus affording the culprits an opportunity to make good their escape, if they were minded to appeal to this resort, or enabling them to take the necessary precautions to defy the law. This grave dereliction of duty apart, the subsequent conduct of the police—their so-called cross-examination, their pinning their faith to a crotchet of their own, their carelessness to bring the clue to a successful issue—was not only tantamount to a denial of justice to the party suffering from this terrible calamity, but we shall not be surprised if it gave the culprits a capital opportunity to avail themselves of whatever means of self-defence and protection they could lay hands on, and thus forewarned and forearmed to mock the majesty of British justice. Such being the circumstances connected with the tower case, we believe it would have given no little satisfaction to the public if a reward had been declared by the Government for truthful evidence leading to the satisfactory detection of crime. However, there is a feature of the resolution which may or may not abate the impatience of the people. Government are careful to state that this preliminary declaration must not be understood to bind them to a line of action from which there can be no departure, if one were needed. Government only consider that exceptional circumstances, such as would justify a departure from the salutary rule laid down, do not exist at this moment. This is certainly moving at a pace perhaps slower than the proverbial snail, in a case demanding prompt action and decisive measures. It is true that after the verdict of murder returned by the Coroner's jury against Mánekji Asláji, any pecuniary inducement for the production of evidence against the same culprit might be superfluous. But what is to be borne in mind is that his accomplices have not yet been apprehended, and move about as any free and harmless being. We are not in a position to know what the police have done to bring them to justice, but what is known is that the police are yet in no possession of knowledge about them. If the danger of speculative misleading suggestions or of a false charge be the fear which induces the authorities to postpone the offer of a reward, they had better dismiss such a fear as that, for it is a mere truism to say that falsehood has never a leg to stand upon. Nevertheless, we ought to be thankful for small mercies even; and while acknowledging the good will and kindly intentions of the Government, we hope that they will exert themselves with greater promptitude, concern and vigour in the matter.

12. The Káthiáwár Times (3), in its issue of the 15th June, writes:—With due respect to the views of Government embodied in their resolution on the Rájábái Tower tragedy, we beg to point out to Government that there is immense difference between the criminal history of England and that of India, and that it is not always safe to be guided by English methods in Indian matters. Our view is that the present is the proper time for offering a Government reward. We might also add that we do not quite approve of the idea of convening public meetings in connection with the tragedy just at this stage. By doing so at present we shall be hampering a fair enquiry. All that the public has to do at this stage is to get as much reliable evidence as possible and to find out Mánekji Asláji's companions in crime.

13. The Kaiser-i-Hind (86), in its issue of the 14th June, writes:—The profane have a saying that the road to hell is paved with good intentions; and it would seem from the tenor of last Wednesday's resolution of the Government on the subject of the Rájábái Tower tragedy that His Excellency the Governor and his advisers are fully of that profane conviction. They seem to fancy that the indignant and impatient public, who are clamorous for some effectual and expeditious means to get at the bottom of the truth in the matter of the two lamentable deaths, would appreciate the good intentions which have prompted that resolution. It remains, however, to be seen in what directions those intentions gravitate eventually. For, after all that has been said and written, what does it propose to do? We emphatically say, absolutely nothing. We do not care two straws about its arguments touching the inadvisability of offering the reward from the subscriptions which a contemporary has raised. Even if it had made up its mind to accept the offer, we do not think the public would have been nearer the discovery of the perpetrators of the crime. For, we suspect that owing to the reprehensible neglect of the police to display due diligence in tracing the criminals, a good deal of what might have been important evidence is fast disappearing. The Government may wait till doomsday to be any nearer the discovery, with or without a reward. To expect for those "exceptional circumstances" which "may present themselves at a later stage" to justify its offering a reward, is as much as to expect that the man from the moon will reach the earth to tell what he decried on that eventful 25th April from his lunar position. We say (and what we say is, we repeat, simply an echo of popular opinion) that so long as the enquiry is still allowed to be carried on by the present police it will be simple insanity to hope for any further revelations. The Bombay Gazette properly observes that ever since the verdict of the jury (now 11 days old) nothing material has been discovered. Of course not. How could you expect a tittle of fresh evidence to drive the charge of murder home to Mánekji Aláji and his accomplices, with a police which, even before any formal investigation began, jumped to the preposterous conclusion that there was no evidence of outrage and murder? They have only played the makebelieve and sham farce of identifying the suspect Mahomedans. For that matter they may bring forward every Mahomedan in the town save the real culprits and go on with the mockery of identification for the next twelve months if they like. Now, what has Mr. MacDermott said even after the conclusion of the inquest? In reply to one of the searching questions put to him by the Coroner, he obstinately adhered to his preconceived theory, built on nothing but the cobwebs of his own imagination, that there was no human hand in the deaths of the two girls. And yet with a strange appreciation of the motives which inspire ordinary humanity, the sagacious Government of Bombay observes with an infatuation which is simply astounding, that it has "every confidence that the Bombay Police appreciate (the italics are ours) that for the honour and reputation of the force they belong to, extraordinary efforts to clear up a dark mystery are required of them." This is not the language of practical statesmanship, but of a proud bureaucracy which is always pretending to justify, urbe et orbi, its own existence as the very personification of infallible wisdom. In the first place, we deny that there is any mystery now left. The principal facts are already disclosed, unless the Government is prepared to say that the circumstantial evidence disclosed at a later stage before the Coroner is all moonshine, as the apologists of the police are deliberately trying to make out in some public prints. The Government seems to exonerate the police from the public charge of negligence by observing that "important witnesses did not present themselves before the Coroner until weeks after the enquiry had commenced." Whose fault was it, the witnesses' or the police's? Is the Government unaware of the fact that somehow witnesses other than those whom the police selected to bring before the Coroner did not care to come at an earlier stage for two reasons: firstly, because they thought the reputation of the police was so dear to it that it would not fail to find out the miscreants; and, secondly, because of the fear of the police. The police would have found no "difficulties" whatever if it had from the beginning gone on the right track; but for some reason or other it chose not to do so. Has the Government demanded from the Commissioner of Police a categorical reply why the police behaved in this fashion? If it has, will it publish the reply? If not, will it demand it? Then, has the Government assured itself that Mr. MacDermott has spoken the truth with regard to the statement made by Mr. Enty? That statement is of a most important character. It deliberately charges that police officer with having heard from Mánekji Aláji's mouth that two Mahomedans had a scuffle with the girls and that he was there to interfere. Either Mr. Enty has perjured himself or Mr. MacDermott. The former was corroborated by Mr. Confectioner. What has the Commissioner of Police to say in defence of Mr. MacDermott? Has the Government called for a report on this matter? Then take the story of the bundle, true or false. Why did the Commissioner refuse personally to accompany his informer and identify the parcel? Was it or was it not his duty in a serious case like this to have made personal enquiries? And why did the Police Superintendent delay to inspect it and allow 56 hours to lapse before repairing to the locality where the bundle was supposed to be? Has the Government called for a satisfactory explanation from the Commissioner and his subordinates, and, if not, why not? But are not these sufficient facts to disprove the statement that the police had not early information? It is all nonsense to say the police had difficulties.

The allegation requires to be verified. All the difficulties were of its own creation and we regret that the Government, which ought to be an impartial judge of such matters, should have committed itself to this one-sided cock-and-bull story of the difficulties of the police. This very fact shows that the Government has no sincere intentions on this subject. Government seems to be so hopelessly out of touch with popular feeling and sentiment that it is infatuated enough to believe that everything will be conducted in a fair spirit. Humanly speaking, is it possible that under existing circumstances even those who know facts will care to come forward? The moment they do they will be on the black list of the police. If the Government is really sincere in its intentions to go to the bottom of the truth and bring the culprits to justice, then the steps it has announced in the resolution are the last steps to bring about the object. They will never do. What is wanted is this: (1) That the investigation be placed in other hands than those in which it is now given; (2) that a small committee be appointed, consisting of a Presidency Magistrate and two independent Native gentlemen of unimpeachable character, to take down evidence of informers and pass it on to the Government Solicitor, and that all possible steps be taken to keep free from harm the witnesses. Then alone will the public have confidence, and then alone will witnesses come forward to give the right evidence. Otherwise the investigation before the Magistrate, as we observed last week, is doomed to failure. And so long as that is the case, we consider the present resolution to be a mere eyewash. In short, for that matter it may as well have been buried in oblivion or consigned to the waste-paper basket of the department whence it emanated.

14. The Broach Mitrá (95), in its issue of the 17th June, observes:—Government would have done better if they had kept quiet instead of issuing a resolution regarding the Rájábái Tower tragedy justifying the conduct of the police and thereby adding insult to injury. The public does not think that the police officers in charge of the case will be able to throw fresh light on the fatality; and if His Excellency Lord Harris be really desirous of getting the mystery cleared up he should transfer Messrs. MacDermott and Brewin from Bombay and appoint Mr. Dhanjisháh Dádábhái, Acting Superintendent of Police, Thána, or some other able officer on special duty.

15. The Pársi Tikákár (115), in its issue of the 15th June, regrets that Government should have failed to take severe notice of the conduct of the several police officers who in spite of public opinion instituted enquiries into the tower fatality on a wrong line from the very commencement, and hopes that Government will take proper steps in the matter after the close of the criminal trial of Mánekji Asláji for the honour and prestige of the police. The Tikákár, however, hopes that the police officers who are entrusted with the case will change their line of enquiry and try to bring the offenders to book. It also advises the Pársis to offer a reward for the detection of the criminals.

16. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 14th June, writes:—We hear that Government have deemed it fit to postpone the appointment of the talked-of commission of police officers not connected with the Bombay force to make strict enquiries to find out the culprits in the Rájábái Tower tragedy case. This is, to be sure, a piece of intelligence which will disappoint the public very much. We wish an order yet came from the Government, contradicting this rumour of non-appointment of the commission, as in the absence of earnestness in the local police the need for such a committee for the elucidation of the whole affair is apparent. The Bombay police, either from remissness, lack of resourcefulness, or something else, have failed to bring to light the dark crimes that are said to have been committed in the tower within the sacred precincts of the temple of learning. If half the stories which are rife, of attack and outrage on women of other castes, be true, it seems that the tower has long been lent for nefarious purposes by the sepoys in whose keeping it has been; and if from one of the embellishments of the city it is converted into a rendezvous for miscreants and ruffians, it implies the complicity of not one, two, but many men. That the police failed to track the perpetrators of this heinous crime is in itself a grievous fact, but it further adds to the impatience and anxiety of the public. What is needed is the extirpation of this horrible crime and atrocity, and that must be an impossible feat as long as the crotchety police officers, who change their mind in a night and hop from one conclusion to another instead of persevering in the enquiry, have the field. Now more than ever is it imperative on the Government to appoint the commission, so that the remaining truth may raise its head. The University havaldár and witnesses of this sort said that they followed the girls to the top of the tower, but the Pársi children, whose evidence has never been called in question and who were from the beginning there, deposed that the sepoys never came up. It is really important to enquire which evidence is based on fiction and which on fact. The reason why the police assumed a position of stubbornness and hostility is, again, worth enquiry, and it would be simply defying common sense to allow them to sit in judgment over their own share of doings. In the name of truth and justice, therefore, we recommend the Government to take action in the matter very soon, and expedite the appointment of the commission to unravel the many mysteries connected with this black business.

Rumour about the Mahomedans of Bombay thinking of making a wholesale attack on the Pársis for connecting two Khojás with the Rájábái Tower fatality.

17. The Jáme Jamshed (85), in its issue of the 15th June, says:—On seeing the telegram in the Indian Statesman that the Mahomedans of Bombay, being exasperated on account of the names of two Mahomedans being rumoured in connection with the Rájábái Tower fatality, intended to create a disturbance on Friday last, but the police having taken necessary precautions the event did not occur, we called upon the Bombay correspondent of the Statesman for an explanation. He stated that at the last sitting of the Coroner's jury in the Rájábái Tower tragedy case he heard some persons talk on the subject and he accordingly wired the information to the Statesman, considering it a sensational rumour, and he did not think he did anything improper in not ascertaining if there was any truth in it before he wired it.

Rumours about the two Khojás said to be the accomplices of Mánekji Aláji in the Rájábái Tower tragedy, and about the missing bundle of clothes.

18. The Pársi Tikákár (115), in its issue of the 7th June, observes:—It is rumoured that one of the two Khojás who are said to be the accomplices of Mánekji Aláji in the Rájábái Tower tragedy had gone to a very distant country called Nandbár, whence he returned about a fortnight ago and has again left Bombay for a near town for change of air. The other Khoja or Memon is also said to have recently gone to some cool hilly station for a change. It is also rumoured that the missing bundle of clothes belonging to one of the two Khojás is in the possession of a European gentleman, whose name we, however, do not like to disclose at present.

Reform of the police and of the criminal law recommended.

19. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 14th June, writes:—We have known instances of triple and quadruple murders remaining undetected or unpunished in the mofussil. The criminal law requires the most stringent proof of guilt, specially in capital crimes. The High Courts by their rulings have, if possible, increased this stringency. The eminent barristers who appear before them are masters of the science of advocacy, and in a trial of wits they easily distance the police. A case which to a man of common sense may appear to be well proved is, thanks to the forensic art, shown in a trice to be utterly unsustainable, or at least open to doubt. The police can never anticipate all the resources of argument available to counsel. They require a legal adviser during their investigation to tell them how far the evidence collected by them will go at the trial, and what more evidence will be necessary. But, curiously enough, though the Public Prosecutor appears in every sessions trial, his services are not available during the preliminary investigation. An executive order empowering the police to take the advice of the Public Prosecutor in all sessions cases during the course of investigation will remove one glaring defect in the present procedure. Again, the time allowed to the police for finishing their investigations is too short. If they suspect any one they cannot detain him for more than 24 hours without the order of the Magistrate. But this provision of the law is not, in practice, strictly enforced, and the police have coined a new word nazarband to distinguish their informal detention of suspects from formal arrest. We have heard of cases in which accused persons were detained in such informal custody for over a fortnight, and we have heard of others in which Magistrates refused to grant any extension to the police in very serious cases in which such extension was extremely necessary. Very often the law is "more honoured in the breach than in the observance," and as often the observance of the law is worse than its breach. It is high time, therefore, to reconsider this law. Again, the trying Judge is supposed to be bound to examine only those witnesses for the prosecution whose evidence was heard by the accused before the committing Magistrate. There have been actually some rulings to this effect, though the Criminal Procedure Code authorizes all courts to call any persons as witnesses at any stage of the case. It often happens that a Judge wants further evidence to remove his doubts. But the uncertainty of the law created by the rulings we have mentioned is such that a trial is seldom adjourned to procure it. The subordinate Magistrates, like the police, seldom realize the exigencies of a sessions trial, and very often evidence which appears to them convincing is found at the trial to be utterly insufficient. The benefit of the doubt is then given to the accused, and though later there may be conclusive evidence forthcoming against him he cannot be tried again. We are not against this rule of res judicata in criminal cases. But the rule itself makes it imperatively necessary that the investigation of the police and the enquiry of the Magistrate should be of the most thorough-going character before the trial is held. In this connection we are reminded of a decision of our High Court to the effect that Magistrates enquiring into sessions cases should, as a rule, commit to the sessions if there is any evidence of the commission of the offence forthcoming. The High Court has practically deprived the Magistrates of the power conferred upon them by the Legislature of determining whether a prima facie case has been made out, for the High Court has ruled that the Magistrates should not weigh the evidence in such cases and should leave it to be weighed by the higher court. The effects of this decision have been extremely mischievous, for it has altogether done away with the responsibility of committing Magistrates, and they no longer care to see that only cases likely to end in conviction are sent to the sessions. The law, as it stands, gives ample authority to the higher courts to order the committal of any case not committed by a Magistrate, and it is difficult to understand why the High Court has passed a decision which is entailing unnecessary committals and waste of time, labour and money. But the defects pointed out above are as nothing compared with the defects in the organisation of our police force. The lower ranks are recruited from undesirable classes, and are paid on a scale which bears hardly any proportion to their powers or to their duties. The Government has learnt during the recent agitation against the Age of Consent Bill how unpopular the police are in all parts of India. Few care to give any information to them, for the informants may themselves be run in as criminals. The police expect the aggrieved persons to act as detectives, and the aggrieved have also in some parts of the mofussil to play the host and to see that the police are comfortably housed and fed. There are very few sessions cases in which police torture is not alleged, and the frequency of these allegations indicates a dark plague-spot in our administration. As usual, it is the poor that suffer the most, and it is on this account, perhaps, that nothing has as yet been done to reform the Police Department. But we hope that the Government will now pay some attention to this matter, and at least direct the organization of a special detective force, if it cannot deal with the question in its entirety.

Proposed appointment of Mr. Webb as Third Presidency Magistrate in Bombay strongly protested against.

20. The Kaiser-i-Hind (86), in its issue of the 14th June, writes:—When we broadly hinted four weeks ago that a scandalous judicial job was on the tapis and endeavoured to arouse public opinion on the unjustifiable character of it, we had some hopes that outside criticism would make the Government of Bombay think twice before it irrevocably committed itself to its perpetration and offered a strong ground for protest on the matter. At any rate, it was hoped that from his personal knowledge and official experience the Judicial Member of His Excellency's Council would be the last person to be privy to the nomination of Mr. Webb as Third Magistrate
